On America's West Coast, General Frank Andrews of the Panama Command and General John DeWitt of the Western Defense Command placed their troops on an instant war footing. DeWitt was specific in his message to Washington: "This command now ready to carry out tasks assigned." He relayed copies of the Stimson/Marshall order to the Naval Districts in California and Oregon. In Panama, General Andrews assured Marshall that all was in readiness to defend the Panama Canal. Every troop unit was on a continuous watch and Navy vessels patrolled the Pacific sea lanes leading to the canal. He emphasized that Army radar operations were working around the clock on a mission to detect hostile aircraft.³⁶

A different military situation prevailed in Hawaii. Though ordering Short to conduct reconnaissance and not to jeopardize his defensive measures, the Stimson/Marshall message had specifically told Short: "Do not alarm the civil population or disclose intent." When he read these orders, Short was baffled. How was he to conduct reconnaissance or place his 25,000 troops on a war footing without alarming a civilian population intimately connected to life at the massive US base? There was no way to hide the troop movement or fighters and bombers engaged in a massive air search. Hillside home sites above Honolulu looked down on all the Army posts as well as on Pearl Harbor. General Short complained, "I couldn't possibly order my troops on an all-out alert without telling them who to shoot at."³⁷

Short was also well aware of the intense scrutiny of Hawaii's news media. The two daily papers, the Advertiser and the Star-Bulletin, covered military activities with determination. Putting Oahu's troops on full alert would have been front-page news. Both newspapers owned broadcast stations in Honolulu, affiliated respectively with the NBC and CBS radio news networks. Short saw only one military option: he placed his troops on a low-alert status, a sabotage/espionage watch that did little to actually raise the level of military readiness. Soldiers continued their daily routines. Guns and ammunition were stowed away in padlocked cabinets. He did order a secret predawn surveillance by the radar operations of the Army's Aircraft Warning Service. Hawaii's excellent Army radar facilities could detect aircraft at 130 miles' distance and provide at least a fortyminute warning to the approach of hostile aircraft.

In midafternoon on November 27, Short wired General Marshall:

DEPARTMENT ALERTED TO PREVENT SABOTAGE. LIAISON WITH NAVY.

The word "liaison" should have meant that Short had exchanged combat information with Admiral Kimmel. But there was no liaison. The Navy officers assigned to Short's radar unit never reported for duty. His eight-word message was the least responsive of all those of the sixteen Army commanders who acknowledged Marshall's alert. But those eight words were just what Marshall wanted to hear from Hawaii. Short and his soldiers were in no position to prevent a Japanese attack. Just to be sure that Short didn't adopt a more aggressive response, Marshall's adjutant general, Emory S. Adams, sent another message the next day. It pushed Short toward an antisabotage mode and away from the placement of the troops on a full alert which the available intelligence had shown so clearly was needed:³⁸

CRITICAL SITUATION DEMANDS THAT ALL PRECAUTIONS BE TAKEN IMMEDIATELY AGAINST SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES WITHIN FIELD OF INVESTIGATIVE RESPONSIBILITY OF WAR DEPARTMENT PAREN SEE PARAGRAPH THREE MID SC THIRTY DASH FORTY FIVE END PAREN STOP ALSO DESIRED THAT YOU INITIATE FORTHWITH ALL ADDITIONAL MEASURES NECESSARY TO PROVIDE FOR PROTECTION OF YOUR ESTABLISHMENTS COMMA PROPERTY COMMA AND EQUIPMENT AGAINST SABOTAGE COMMA PROTECTION OF YOUR PERSONNEL AGAINST SUBVERSIVE PROPAGANDA AND PROTECTION OF ALL ACTIVITIES AGAINST ESPIONAGE STOP THIS DOES NOT REPEAT NOT MEAN THAT ANY ILLEGAL MEASURES ARE AUTHORIZED STOP PROTECTIVE MEASURES SHOULD BE CONFINED TO THOSE ESSENTIAL TO SECURITY COMMA AVOIDING UNNECESSARY PUBLICITY AND ALARM STOP TO INSURE SPEED OF TRANSMISSION IDENTICAL TELEGRAMS ARE BEING SENT TO ALL AIR STATIONS BUT THIS DOES NOT REPEAT NOT AFFECT YOUR RESPONSIBILITY UNDER EXISTING INSTRUCTIONS X ADAMS.

General Short placed full trust in his "old friend of forty years," General Marshall. Admiral Kimmel did the same. Kimmel had been friends with his boss, Admiral Harold Stark, since their Naval Academy days. But after the successful Japanese raid on December 7, Marshall would go on to be lauded for his direction of World War II in his role as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Kimmel and Short would be fired.

WAR MAY COME QUICKER THAN ANYONE DREAMS

ON FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 28TH, WITH THE STRENGTH OF the Japanese carrier and submarine fleet headed for Pearl Harbor, President Roosevelt decided to leave the nation's capital and head for Georgia. To keep the President up-to-date on the crisis, a new communication official was added to the White House staff who would play an important role in delivering communications intelligence to the President during the last week of peace. He was Navy Lieutenant Lester R. Schulz,¹ who—because of the suddenness of the trip—wasn't fully prepared for the journey. Schulz had just one hour to pack his suitcase and jump aboard US Number One, the special presidential railroad train. Even worse, he had no train ticket. Just days before, Schulz had completed a training course in Navy radio communication methods given by instructors at Station US. Upon finishing the course, he was assigned as assistant naval aide to the President of the United States, to be used as a communications courier. His job: custodian of the presidential leather pouch that contained the secret Japanese radio intercepts and the intelligence monographs.

The presidential party was en route to Warm Springs, Georgia, for a delayed Thanksgiving holiday celebration with patients of the Polio Institute.² Before leaving, FDR held a fifty-minute White House meeting with William Donovan and Secretary of War Henry Stimson in the upstairs Oval Study. After Donovan departed, the President and Stimson moved to the Oval Office, where they were joined by the “War Cabinet” (Stimson's term) of Cordell Hull, Frank Knox, General Marshall, and Admiral Stark in a noon conference.³

Stimson's morning meeting in FDR's bedroom centered on strategies involving Japan. According to Stimson, “He branched into an analysis of the situation himself as he sat there on his bed saying there were three alternatives and only three that he could see before us. His alternatives were—first, to do nothing; second, to make something in the nature of an ultimatum again, stating a point beyond which we would fight; third, to fight at once. I told him my only two were the last two, because I did not think anyone would do nothing in this situation, and he agreed with me.”⁴

Stimson's account of the Oval Study discussion was disingenuous. Alternative number one was the policy. The military orders placing the policy in effect had been sent to America's admirals and generals the previous afternoon: do nothing militarily that could be regarded as a posture of offense; let Japan commit the first overt act. The morality issue of placing US servicemen and civilians in harm's way was discussed three days earlier at a noon meeting in the White House. It was a troublesome issue for the policy-makers, who included FDR, Stimson, Secretary of the Navy Knox, Secretary of State Hull, General Marshall, and Admiral Stark. Stimson's diary entry discussed the morality issue, “One problem troubled us very much. If you know your enemy is going to strike you, it is not usually wise to wait until he gets the jump on you by taking the initiative. The question was how we should maneuver them into the position of firing the first shot without allowing too much danger to ourselves. It was a difficult proposition,” Stimson wrote.⁵

The catalyst behind the White House discussion was overcoming America's opposition to war. Opinion polls—watched by the cabinet members—said that Americans, while favoring military aid to Great Britain, were opposed to sending troops overseas to participate in another world war. Pros and cons of the policy were recorded by Stimson in his diary. “In spite of the risk involved, however, in letting the Japanese fire the first shot, we realized that in order to have the full support of the American people, it was desirable to make sure that the Japanese be the ones to do this, so that there should remain no doubt in anyone's mind as to who were the aggressors.” A policy of doing nothing to oppose Japan militarily—it can be argued—had been firmly adopted.

The adoption came at noon on Tuesday, November 25, in Washington; across the international date line the time at Hitokappu Bay was 1:00 A.M. on Wednesday, November 26. Buglers were about to sound reveille for the crews of the thirty-one warships and awaken them for their journey to Hawaii, which was set to start at 6:00 A.M.

As the week drew to a close, more subtle diplomatic alternatives surfaced in Washington that appear to be cover stories designed—once Pearl Harbor was history—to take the focus off the stand-aside policy. During the November 28 White House meeting, the War Cabinet agreed with another presidential suggestion—that a special telegram⁶ be dispatched to Emperor Hirohito warning that “disastrous events would be set afoot” if a severe blow was aimed at the Allied powers of Britain, Holland, and America by Japan. Roosevelt addressed the message to the Emperor but delayed its transmission for over a week, until the night of December 6. In the 816-word cablegram, FDR said he was concerned about situations of extraordinary importance to both countries.

THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES, BELIEVING IN PEACE AND IN THE RIGHT OF NATIONS TO LIVE AND LET LIVE, HAVE EAGERLY WATCHED THE CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN OUR TWO GOVERNMENTS DURING THESE PAST MONTHS. WE HAVE HOPED FOR A TERMINATION OF THE PRESENT CONFLICT BETWEEN JAPAN AND CHINA. WE HAVE HOPED THAT A PEACE OF THE PACIFIC COULD BE CONSUMMATED IN SUCH A WAY THAT NATIONALITIES OF MANY DIVERSE PEOPLES COULD EXIST SIDE BY SIDE WITHOUT FEAR OF INVASION; THAT UNBEARABLE BURDENS OF ARMAMENTS COULD BE LIFTED FOR THEM ALL; AND THAT ALL PEOPLES WOULD RESUME COMMERCE WITHOUT DISCRIMINATION AGAINST OR IN FAVOR OF ANY NATION.

Roosevelt closed the message by asking the Emperor to GIVE THOUGHT IN THIS DEFINITE EMERGENCY TO A WAY OF DISPELLING THE DARK CLOUDS.

Roosevelt held up this message and didn’t dispatch it to Tokyo until 8:00 P.M. on December 6 (EST). It was sent to Hirohito by way of Ambassador Joseph Grew. At 12:15 A.M. on December 8, Tokyo Time, Grew met with Foreign Minister Shigenori Togo and requested an audience with the Emperor. Togo replied, saying he would present the matter to the Throne, but made no definite commitment. Grew returned to the embassy. An audience was never granted. Launch time of the First Air Fleet was about three hours away.⁷

After Friday’s War Cabinet concluded, the President headed for Union Station and went aboard his special railroad car, the Ferdinand Magellan, for the Georgia trip. If FDR was anxious about the worsening crisis, he covered it well. On Saturday afternoon, November 29, he drove his Ford roadster (equipped with hand controls, since his legs were paralyzed by polio) through Warm Springs and the beautiful grounds of the Institute greeting patients and well-wishers. The car’s radio was tuned to the Army-Navy football game. He stopped at the cottage of his former secretary, Marguerite “Missy” Le Hand, who was recuperating from a stroke and neuritis suffered in 1940 while she was living in her third-floor White House suite.

Later that evening, Roosevelt was relaxed as he carved the roasted tom turkey. He sliced chunks of white meat for his guests in Georgia Hall, the spa’s grand dining room. The chefs had prepared a twenty-four-course meal including a choice of seven desserts. After dinner, the patients entertained the presidential party with a skit in which the leading character in a dream sequence heard the voice of the President appoint himself Dictator of Warm Springs. FDR picked up the skit’s theme when he addressed the gathering. He commented that much of the world was owned and controlled by real live dictators, and ended his remarks with this prophesy: “United States soldiers, sailors, and marines might be fighting in defense of this country’s institutions by next Thanksgiving.”⁸

Upon returning to the Little White House, FDR held a long conversation on the phone with Secretary of State Cordell Hull. Both agreed that the President should return to Washington immediately because of press accounts reporting bellicose statements by Japan’s Premier, General Hideki Tojo. They set an arrival deadline of “before noon on Monday” (December 1), according to Press Secretary Steve Early.⁹

The President’s personal car, the Ferdinand Magellan, and the rest of the railroad train were recalled from Atlanta to be ready for the President’s return.¹⁰ A. C. Spencer, the Southern Railroad official in charge of the train, passed orders to control towers. Along the nearly 700 miles of track between Newnan, Georgia, and the nation’s capital, Southern tower operators hoisted a dark gray ball—a railroad signal that ordered the tracks cleared. As the President’s train sped on its way, troop and military supply trains were shunted to sidings to permit its swift passage to Washington.¹¹

Upon his return to the White House on December 1, Roosevelt met for over an hour with Secretary of the Navy Knox, Secretary of State Hull, and Admiral Stark, who was the only military officer present. At least four diplomatic messages between Japan and Germany awaited the President. In the last week of peace, Japan’s Foreign Minister, Shigenori Togo, her ambassador to Germany, Baron Hiroshi Oshima, and Ambassador Kichisaburo Nomura in Washington were as talkative on their dot-dash transmissions as Admiral Nagumo.¹² Through these four intercepts, Roosevelt learned that Japanese military action was near. All four intercepts were obtained by one of the Pacific listening posts, Station SAIL at Seattle, which eavesdropped on the Foreign Ministry radio circuits transmitting the Purple diplomatic code, Japan’s high-security cryptic system for overseas diplomatic missions. A November 28 Station SAIL intercept read:

IN A FEW DAYS US-JAPAN NEGOTIATIONS WILL BE DE FACTO RUPTURED. DO NOT GIVE THE IMPRESSION THAT NEGOTIATIONS ARE BROKEN OFF.

Two of Togo's other dispatches followed; they contained instructions to Ambassador Oshima in Berlin that added clarification to the foreign minister's intentions. They were directed at Adolf Hitler and Germany's Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop. One of the dispatches read:

SAY VERY SECRETLY TO THEM THERE IS EXTREME DANGER THAT WAR MAY SUDDENLY BREAK OUT BETWEEN THE ANGLO SAXON NATIONS AND JAPAN THROUGH SOME CLASH OF ARMS. THIS MAY COME QUICKER THAN ANYONE DREAMS.

Roosevelt asked for a copy of the "extreme danger" dispatch for his personal files.¹³

Although none of the Purple dispatches cited above mentioned Pearl Harbor as a target, a fifth intercept received midweek should have eliminated all doubt. It disclosed that Tokyo planned "last-minute" instructions for Washington and Honolulu. On December 3, Japanese diplomatic missions located in the United States, Great Britain, and the Netherlands East Indies received orders to destroy all their code systems. Japan's embassy in Washington and its Honolulu consulate were exempted; they were directed to retain certain code systems for eleventh-hour orders. If nothing else, these diplomatic intercepts and the massive submarine advance on Hawaii revealed by the naval intercepts signaled war in a matter of days.

In Washington, military officials recognized that Japan's code-destruction order meant war. Rear Admiral Richmond Turner, the Navy's war-plans officer, said, "Destruction of codes is a definite and sure indication of war."¹⁴ To Rochefort in Pearl Harbor, the code destruction "looked damn bad" and he personally warned Admiral Bloch, the Commandant of the Fourteenth Naval District, "We ought to take whatever steps we can."¹⁵

Admiral Kimmel received similar information from his assistant Edwin Layton, but failed to interpret the code-destruction order as meaning immediate war with the United States. Kimmel seems to have been influenced by his two war-plans officers, Captain Charles McMorris and Commander Vincent Murphy. Between December 1 and 6, both told Kimmel that a Japanese raid on Hawaii was unlikely.¹⁶

On December 3, as the crisis worsened, the Navy Department ordered Station SAIL to concentrate on the Tokyo-Washington radio circuits of RCA and Mackay and to forward the dispatches on a high-speed teleprinter circuit to the Navy Department. Almost all of the messages intercepted by SAIL were in the Purple diplomatic system. When they reached Washington, Army and Navy code-breakers decoded and translated the intercepts the same day, usually within a few hours. By December 4, a paper trail of Japanese intercepts had found its way to the White House. Japan's diplomatic messages, Japanese navy communications, and RDF bearings locating Japanese warships heading toward American territory in the Western, North, and Central Pacific were all in the pipeline and available to Roosevelt.¹⁷

Remarkable intelligence work by the cryptanalysts at Station CAST discovered most but not all of Japan's Hawaii force. Though Japan's navy reassigned radio call signs for her 200 warships and commanders at midnight of November 30, the CAST cryptographers detected the ruse. By switching radio identities Japan hoped to confuse American intelligence agencies and derail efforts in tracking the warships toward Hawaii. It didn't work. By constant monitoring of the naval broadcasts on December 1 to 5, CAST obtained the revised radio code names for all the vessels, including the carriers. The cryptographers also identified new radio call signs for Admiral Nagumo and Admiral Yamamoto, the commander-in-chief of the Japanese fleet. (See TESTM dispatch of Dec. 5, 1941, in Appendix D.)

CAST had developed the list of new call signs and quickly sent copies to HYPO at Pearl Harbor. But instead of reporting the crucial evidence of Japanese carrier radio transmissions to Admiral Kimmel, Rochefort ignored the CAST reports. In his Daily Communication Summaries of December 1 to 5,¹⁸ he wrote that there was no information on the carriers of the First Air Fleet: "Not one carrier has been identified." His next summary, based on intercepts of December 5 and delivered to Kimmel on Saturday morning, December 6, modified the statement. In six words, Rochefort informed Kimmel that Admiral Yamamoto had "originated several [radio] messages to the Carriers."¹⁹ There were more than "several." Station H operator logs list ten messages to fleet units that were dispatched by Yamamoto on December 5. Seven of those broadcasts were directed to the Hawaii force and were intercepted by radio operators Maynard Albertson, Henry F. Garstka, and Joseph C. Howard. In his log entry, Garstka said he copied one broadcast on the long-distance frequency of 16,620 kilocycles. All three operators obtained Yamamoto's call signs, which had been identified by CAST earlier in the week. Obviously Rochefort had received the information, was able to recognize the admiral's new call signs, and informed Kimmel.

By 1:00 P.M. on December 5, Homer Kisner at Station H had delivered Yamamoto's ten messages to Rochefort's office at Pearl Harbor. The full details of the crucial intercepts remain hidden by Navy censors. None were released by President Carter in his declassification order of 1979. John Taylor, the archivist in charge of Japanese naval intercepts, confirmed to the author in 1996 that they were not found in the Archives II files.

Rochefort should have identified the carriers by name, and fully discussed the seven intercepts with Admiral Kimmel on Saturday morning, December 6, but he did not. America's top naval code-breaker failed to follow the creed: "Tell your commander today of Japan's plan for tomorrow." Instead Rochefort ignored the report from CAST and gave no communication details of the messages intercepted from Japan's naval chief. Such details are crucial in communications intelligence—and especially in this case, for they indicated a progressive movement away from Japan in an eastward direction. The move from 12,330 kilocycles to the 16,000-kilocycle spectrum detected by Henry Garstka represented a big jump in distance. Kisner's chronology set the stage for recognizing the jump the previous day, December 5, when he reported that Radio Tokyo was heard broadcasting simultaneously on dual frequencies²⁰ to ships at a great distance from Japan. He told Rochefort the frequencies used by Tokyo were 32 kilocycles and 12,330 kilocycles.

Kisner later explained the significance of the dual broadcasts during interviews with the author in 1988 and 1998. "Tokyo and Radio Ominato in north Japan wanted to reach the First Air Fleet's vessels and its escorting submarines in the North Pacific. So they chose two frequencies: the daytime long-distance frequency of 12,330 kilocycles, which bounces off the ionosphere, and the ground-wave frequency of 32 kilocycles, which travels over the surface of the earth and is ideal for reaching submerged (or half-submerged) submarines. The dual-frequency transmission was a well known communication technique in 1941 and necessary to communicate with a full fleet across a great distance." He pointed out that Garstka's discovery of a higher frequency of 16,620 kilocycles indicated a further progression of the warships from Tokyo. The powerful antenna systems and radio receivers of the battleships and carriers of Japan's First Air Fleet picked up the sky wave from the ionosphere, whereas the ground wave was perfect for the subs, which lacked the powerful radio facilities.²¹

Kimmel was entitled to know if Yamamoto was using the great-distance frequency to reach "the Carriers," which at the time were about 900 miles north of Oahu. There is no record that Kimmel and Layton discussed Yamamoto's radio contact with the flattops during their morning meeting on December 6. None of the original Station CAST reports that identified Japan's Hawaii force, nor Kisner's "great distance" intercepts, were ever introduced or discussed by any of the Pearl Harbor investigations, including the 1995 inquiry headed by Senator Thurmond.

Since the CAST reports directly contradict both American and Japanese claims that the Hawaii raiding force was on radio silence and never originated or received radio messages, the author sought verification of the reports from Navy Captain Duane Whitlock,²² who was one of the radio traffic analysts at CAST in the fall of 1941. When shown the reports by the author during a 1993 interview, Whitlock confirmed their authenticity. "Our radio direction finder was located on Corregidor Island and operated day and night on Japanese warships and military units. Not only did we furnish copies to Admiral Hart and General MacArthur, copies were sent by radio dispatch to HYPO," he told the author. In 1941, Whitlock believed that the copies sent to HYPO would be shown to Admiral Kimmel. "All of our COMINT was available to Admiral Hart. I assumed our copies were shown to Kimmel; that was Navy policy." Whitlock explained that the reports were first encoded in a Navy code system called TESTM before being dispatched to Hawaii.²³ The TESTM system was used exclusively for radio direction finder (RDF) data and could only be decoded at CAST, HYPO, or Station US in Washington. "No one else in the Navy could decipher TESTM or any of the other radio intelligence circuits we controlled. We didn't want our cryptographic success to leak out," Whitlock said. He had been posted to CAST as radioman first class for over a year and had extensive prior intercept experience at Navy radio stations in China. Six feet tall, slim, and with excellent language skills, Whitlock commanded attention. He had graduated from the Navy's intercept school at Station US in 1938. He knew and respected Kisner. Both had worked together at CAST until June 1941, when Rochefort picked Kisner to supervise the intercept operation at Station H in Hawaii.²⁴

During the eighteen days between November 16 and December 4, Station CAST identified and located the Japanese carriers Akagi, Zuikaku, and Hiryu, the battleship Kirishima,²⁵ and Cruiser Division Eight, according to Whitlock. On December 4, CAST succeeded in identifying Japan's top-secret radio call signs for both Nagumo and Yamamoto. Their ID came directly off the naval airwaves and indicates a wide disregard for radio silence by the Japanese navy. "We sent this information direct to Kimmel and Washington by radio dispatch and copies were sent to General MacArthur at his headquarters in Manila," Whitlock told the author.²⁶ According to the TESTM files, after December 4 neither Nagumo nor his warships were heard, though CAST continued to intercept messages involving the forces surrounding the Philippines and heading for areas of Southeast Asia.²⁷

"Our facilities intercepted both Japanese diplomatic and naval broadcasts. We had the Purple machine and the means to intercept, decode, and translate its messages. Radio receivers were tuned to every major Japanese diplomatic circuit," he continued. Their coverage included the entire diplomatic network serving China, the Pacific, and points in Europe and South America. "Since we were so near to Japan and its naval operation area we were in an excellent position to intercept radio broadcasts."

Station CAST's cryptographers, intercept operators, and linguists worked in Tunnel Affirm, dug and blasted from the rock of Corregidor, a rock island at the entrance to Manila Bay about thirty miles west of Manila.²⁸ The intercept facilities were forty feet underground, part of a military compound the Navy shared with Army troops stationed at Fort Mills. Intercept antennae and the radio direction finder were topside. Radio wire leads carrying the Japanese katakana message sounds were fed to receiving sets in the 20-foot-wide tunnel. Four radio traffic analysts analyzed intercepts obtained by 63 operators organized in eight-hour shifts, copying Japanese diplomatic and naval broadcasts 24 hours a day. Unlike the Navy's Hawaii intercept operation, which was divided between Pearl Harbor and the windward side of Oahu, on Corregidor the CAST enlisted personnel and eleven officers all worked from the same quarters, producing the TESTM dispatches that should have then been sent to the Admiral.²⁹

None of the nine Pearl Harbor investigations examined the TESTM dispatches or questioned why their crucial data were cut from Kimmel's intelligence loop. Since he was never told, the admiral could not raise the question in his own defense. It was impossible for him to surface the TESTM records; they were locked in Navy vaults until December 1986, when a FOIA released them to the author. In April 1995, Congress reopened the Pearl Harbor probe at the request of Kimmel's family, and directed that the Department of Defense conduct an investigation. But the TESTM documents were not produced by the DOD, even though they had been released by the FOIA. Captain Duane Whitlock—one of America's most honored and heroic code-breakers—was available to explain and identify the dispatches in both 1945 and 1995. He was never asked to testify.

Kimmel's isolation from the intelligence loop can be traced to numerous directives issued from Washington. Explanations for the cut-off varied: His need to know did not apply to diplomatic negotiations since he was a military commander; providing him information from the intercepts would have risked revealing American code-breaking success. The crash of Hawaii's intelligence loop distribution started on November 24 shortly after the Pacific Fleet was pulled from the Vacant Sea. Commander Arthur McCollum contributed to the crash when he issued a new directive, which called a halt to the distribution of Rochefort's Communication Summaries (COMSUMs) and those of other monitoring stations that compiled Japanese naval movements. With the approval of the Director of Naval Intelligence, Captain Theodore S. Wilkinson, McCollum sent this directive to Kimmel [COM 16 was the cover name for CAST; OPNAV for Station US]:

ORANGE NAVAL MOVEMENTS AS REPORTED FROM INDIVIDUAL INFORMATION ADDRESSES ARE OFTEN CONFLICTING BECAUSE OF NECESSARILY FRAGMENTARY NATURE X SINCE COM 16 INTERCEPTS ARE CONSIDERED MOST RELIABLE SUGGEST OTHER REPORTS CAREFULLY EVALUATED BE SENT TO COM 16 FOR ACTION OPNAV FOR INFORMATION X AFTER COMBINING ALL INCOMING REPORTS COM 16 DIRECT DISPATCHES TO OPNAV INFOCINCPAC BASED ON ALL INFORMATION RECEIVED INDICATING OWN EVALUATION AND PROVIDING BEST POSSIBLE CONTINUITY X REQUEST CINCAF ISSUE DIRECTIVE AS NECESSARY TO FULFILL GENERAL OBJECTIVE X³⁰

McCollum's reasoning behind the order is highly suspect and can be seen as a means to distance Roosevelt from Rochefort's warnings. Kimmel's personal alert to the White House on November 25—during FDR's dinner with Princess Martha—was the last Hawaii-originated monograph prepared for FDR.

Hawaii's radio traffic chief Homer Kisner bristled fifty years later when the author told him of McCollum's "most reliable" pronouncement. Kisner dismissed the assertion. "Our reports were not fragmentary. We had very little reception difficulties in Hawaii," he said. "We intercepted at least a thousand Japanese naval messages every twenty-four hours. That's a minimum of about forty-two per hour. Yes, at times there were reception difficulties, but never significant, because Japan's radio facilities constantly repeated messages and we obtained missing broadcasts from the repeats."³¹

After November 26, the reports detailing the Japanese military advance on Hawaii were excised from the Presidential monographs. Decrypts about the movement of two-thirds of the Japanese fleet's submarines toward Hawaii, and the location of the Akagi and oil tankers in the Vacant Sea directly north of Oahu, were kept from the usual distribution by McCollum's order. So were the TESTM reports from the "most reliable" CAST. FDR's monographs were stripped of all the information that mattered.

When he returned from Warm Springs on December 1, President Roosevelt received the first "cleansed" monographs. They were monographs 70 and 71 and were based on Japanese naval intercepts and movement reports obtained and analyzed by CAST personnel. Roosevelt's final monograph, prior to the attack, was routed to him on December 3. No mention was made of locating in a communication zone at Hitokappu Bay the First Air Fleet and the carriers—the force that would soon arrive off Oahu.³²

But the American intelligence network was a complex and multifaceted one. If one channel was blocked, vital information could still flow through many others. The Japanese were coming and Roosevelt knew.

THE JAPS ARE BLASTING AWAY ON THE FREQUENCIES

TWELFTH NAVAL DISTRICT
INTELLIGENCE OFFICE
717 MARKET STREET
SAN FRANCISCO
NOVEMBER 28–DECEMBER 4, 1941

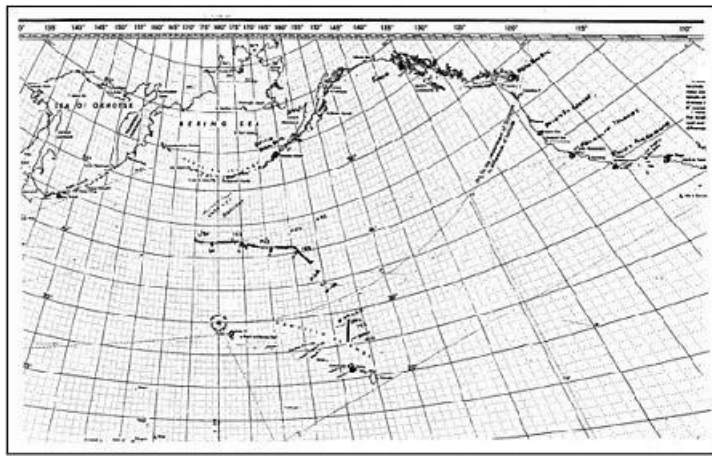

AS THE THANKSGIVING WEEKEND ENDED AND THE MONTH OF NOVEMBER drew to a close, FDR was obtaining the intelligence data that he needed to best serve his interests. Recent research has shown that the most conclusive evidence of the upcoming Japanese attack did reach the White House but has been withheld from public discussion.

In his book Infamy, published in 1982, John Toland wrote that San Francisco's Twelfth Naval District obtained radio direction finder bearings that placed Japanese warships in the Pacific Ocean north of Hawaii from about November 30 to December 4, 1941.¹ Toland's source was Robert Ogg, who in 1941 was on the staff of the naval district intelligence office (DIO) as a special investigator. Ogg remembered that during a five-day period from about November 30 to December 4, his boss, Lieutenant Ellsworth Hosmer, obtained radio direction finder bearings on Japanese warships. Hosmer asked Ogg to enter the bearings on a great-circle chart of the North Pacific Ocean that was kept in the intelligence office on Market Street in San Francisco. Once Ogg plotted them on the chart, the bearings disclosed Japanese warships in the North Pacific.² In his account to Toland and later to US Navy historian Commander Irving Newman, Ogg said he remembered that the bearings came from commercial sources such as RCA Radio and Globe Wireless and from the Navy's radio direction finder station at Dutch Harbor, Alaska. Ogg stated that verification of his account could be found in Dutch Harbor records. Today, over fifty years later, those records have been found.

When Ogg plotted the locations of Japanese warships on the DIO's nautical chart, he noticed that they were moving eastward from the international date line toward the United States mainland. On about December 3 the eastward movement stopped. Then the warships turned south toward Hawaii. At that point, no more RDF bearings were obtained. Based on the distinctive communications procedures of the vessels reported to the DIO, Hosmer felt certain the RDF bearings came from Japanese warships and alerted Captain Richard McCullough, the District's intelligence chief. McCullough told Ogg that he forwarded the alert over a secure radio circuit to Washington, where the information reached the White House.

Robert Ogg has strong ties to America's military; generations of his family served in command positions in both the Army and the Navy.³ Through these connections, Ogg found a close family friend in the commandant of the Twelfth Naval District, Vice Admiral John Greenslade. After Robert Ogg had completed his day's work, he often joined the admiral at his quarters on Yerba Buena island in San Francisco Bay. Over a cocktail the admiral called a "williwaw," the two left work behind and discussed personal matters.⁴

A portion of Greenslade's command included joint administration of the West Coast Communications Intelligence Network. The WCCI was anchored at its southern end by Station ITEM at Imperial Beach (San Diego), California, and extended 3000 miles north along the Pacific Coast to Station KING at Dutch Harbor. In between were RDF coastal facilities at Sitka, Alaska; Bainbridge Island, Washington; plus Point St. George in the Farallon Islands and Point Arguello in California. Greenslade held the keys to GUPID, a Navy code system that enabled him to copy and exchange communications intelligence with CAST, HYPO, and Station US. GUPID was similar to other highly secret systems such as TESTM and COPEK.

In 1987 Robert Ogg reconstructed the great-circle chart bearings he prepared for San Francisco's Twelfth Naval District (dark line). He used the dates November 30 to December 3, 1941. Though it was not part of his original 1941 information, he also traced a Navy RDF bearing, based on Station CAST, locating units of the First Air Fleet on a line of 030 degrees from Corregidor (upper left). The line shows the warships off the Kurile Islands. Ogg added locations of the Navy's RDF stations at Dutch Harbor; Sitka; Bainbridge, Washington (Station SAIL); and California's Point St. George, Farallon Islands, Point Arguello, and San Diego Station ITEM, on the chart. The December 6 positions (lower center) were part of his original bearings, and show the final route of the Japanese warships.

Source: Robert Ogg.

Additional sources for the WCCI included direct liaison with Canadian RDF operations and input from Pan American Airways Clippers, RCA Communications, Mackay Radio & Telegraph, American Telephone & Telegraph, and Globe Wireless. San Francisco was the hub of Pacific Rim commercial communications. All Tokyo diplomatic messages intended for Japanese missions in America passed through the RCA-Mackay-ATT communication funnel in San Francisco. Voice telephone service to and from Japan went through American Telephone & Telegraph offices near Market Street. All Japan-USA commercial wireless messages were routed over RCA and Mackay transmitters and receiving apparatus in the headlands north and south of the Golden Gate. Radio messages for Japanese merchant marine vessels originated in San Francisco at Globe Wireless.

Through this vast network, Greenslade's intelligence crew could listen in all along the Pacific Rim. They purchased Japanese navy code books from Japanese naval communication officers assigned to Marus calling at San Francisco, and placed "bugs" inside the Japanese Consulate. Thus Japan's government secrets sent through the Golden Gate, both military and diplomatic, were readily available to the highest officials in Washington, including Roosevelt in the White House.

Robert Ogg's expertise was in electronics and navigation; it was his superior, Ellsworth Hosmer, who assembled communications intelligence for the Twelfth Naval District from the San Francisco cable (telegraph) and telephone firms and the Navy's intercept stations. Then he and Commander Frank Venzel, the District's communications officer, coordinated the flow of Japanese intelligence data obtained from the Navy's West Coast network to Station US in Washington. Hosmer was known in Navy intelligence as the San Francisco contact man, and he had a direct link to Arthur McCollum at Station US.⁵

Over the November 28–30 weekend, US Navy intercept facilities were told to be on the lookout for the Japanese carrier force.⁶ About Sunday November 30, according to Ogg, commercial radio firms supplied Hosmer with RDF bearings that placed Japanese warships in the North Pacific. The report of vessels in the North Pacific surprised Ogg and Hosmer, for both were aware of the Vacant Sea orders. Ogg said the RDF bearings that he plotted were obtained from the Japanese navy's four-megacycle radio band of 4000 kilocycles.⁷

Vice Admiral John Greenslade, who was both the District's commandant and the commander of the Western Sea Frontier, wore a third hat as naval convoy director for American controlled shipping proceeding west across the Pacific Ocean. Under provisions of the National Emergency Declaration, President Roosevelt had designated two ocean areas off the West Coast as Sea Frontiers: The Panama Sea Frontier and the Western Sea Frontier. Both frontiers extended United States sea authority to about the international date line. One purpose was to exclude German raiders from the areas and to protect British shipping in the Pacific Ocean, principally in the South Pacific. Another was to comply with the Vacant Sea orders from Washington, which rerouted trans-Pacific shipping via the Torres Strait between Australia and New Guinea in the South Pacific.

According to Ogg, Hosmer identified the radio transmissions as Japanese, since the vessels used the unique kana telegraphic code of Japan's navy.⁸ He was certain that the radio signals did not originate with American or Allied vessels, for there were none at sea in the area. Two separate bearings were obtained. One took off from north of San Francisco, the other south. When Ogg traced the two bearings on his chart they intersected in the North Pacific, north of Hawaii. Hosmer was sure that the bearings plotted by Ogg had located warships heading for Hawaii.

Captain Richard McCullough, the District Intelligence Officer, sent these findings in a report to the Navy Department. Most likely it was sent in the GUPID system, which had been assigned to Admiral Greenslade for supersecret contact with Station US and Arthur McCollum. As this book went to press in 1999, censorship prevented a look at the GUPID system. In 1946 the Joint Committee investigating the Pearl Harbor attack was asked to delete all reference of GUPID from the official record of the investigation by the Chief Assistant Counsel Gerhard A. Gesell.⁹

Once received in the nation's capital, the Japanese warship locations were delivered to President Roosevelt in the White House, according to district intelligence chief McCullough.¹⁰ In a handwritten memo filed by Hosmer with the Twelfth Naval District's intelligence office, Hosmer wrote that around November 28 he learned that: "at least six, possibly eight Jap [sic] units were operating between Hawaii and the Aleutians and clearly indicated that a force was to steal out on a secret [mission] and attempt to obtain mastery of the air."¹¹ Hosmer's account differs from Ogg's. Ogg recalled the source as commercial radio facilities; Hosmer said the information was contained in an intercept obtained by a Navy operator from the "Jap Kana code." Asked about the conflicting accounts in 1998, Ogg said there was not really a conflict. "After fifty years, I did not recall the Navy intercepts. It is quite possible Lieutenant Hosmer obtained the bearings from both commercial and Navy sources for he had extensive contacts within the radio industry."¹²

Ogg never testified before any Pearl Harbor investigation, including the 1995 probe. He first disclosed his role in locating the Japanese force north of Hawaii to writer John Toland. Soon after Toland's book appeared, Ogg's statements were challenged by prominent historians, who cited Japanese claims that the Pearl Harbor warships were on radio silence and could not possibly have been intercepted by Americans. Ogg admitted he had no tangible proof of his assertions, since Navy intelligence personnel were forbidden to retain classified documents. But he assured skeptics that confirmation could be found in the records of the Navy's intercept station at Dutch Harbor, Alaska. "Look in the four-megacycle records [4000 kilocycles]. I recall the Japanese broadcasts reported to us were on an odd frequency in that radio spectrum," Ogg said.¹³ But no one looked.

In 1984, all original Japanese intercept records of the Pacific Theater were classified TOP SECRET CODEWORD and held in the custody of the Naval Security Group Command in Washington. The author's requests to the Navy to see the 4000-kilocycle records of Dutch Harbor for November and December 1941 were turned down. Navy historians George W. Henriksen and Commander Irwin Newman told the author that there were no such records in the NSGC files.

Trying a different tack, the author learned of a Navy radio direction finder station at Dutch Harbor known as Station KING, which was a unit of Rochefort's Mid-Pacific Direction Finder Network in 1941. Since KING came under the administration of the Commandant of the Thirteenth Naval District in Seattle, the author checked with the National Archives and in October of 1985 discovered the 4000-kilocycle Dutch Harbor reports.¹⁴ They irrefutably confirm Ogg's intercept details. According to a secret report issued in November 1941 by Chief Radioman Robert Fox, the traffic chief for KING, the Akagi was heard on 4960 kilocycles in tactical communication with several merchant vessels. Fox wrote that the broadcasts were transmitted on a rarely used Japanese naval radio frequency, but did not list the date. The records of Station H provided the last piece in the puzzle and revealed that Hawaii also intercepted an Akagi broadcast on November 26, when the carrier used 4963 kilocycles.¹⁵

The series of intercepted Japanese broadcasts centering in the North Pacific have been overlooked by every Pearl Harbor investigation. They are described here for the first time. Each report is compelling evidence for Ogg's assertions. As of December 3, the number of Japanese warship broadcasts in the North Pacific was significant. In addition to the Hosmer-Ogg source, five Navy listening posts—Stations ITEM, CAST, H, KING, and SAIL—and a Matson liner, the SS Lurline, heard the broadcasts and placed the information in the intelligence pipeline intended for the White House. This vital information obtained by the five units was logged in official Navy reports and forwarded to Washington, but was withheld from Admiral Kimmel and the Pacific Fleet. CAST's identification of the carriers and of Admiral Yamamoto occurred at the same time as and parallels the reports given to Hosmer.

About mid-November, Japan's navy assumed control of overseas civilian broadcast operations. High-powered Japanese radio stations normally used for worldwide commercial overseas broadcasts aimed their signals at the North and Central Pacific. Instead of transmitting to civilian/commercial radio addresses in North or South America or Europe, each broadcast was now directed to Japanese warships, using the secret Yobidashi Fugo address system of radio call signs. Long-distance frequencies beamed the broadcasts from shore stations in Osaka and Tokyo. Immediately, the powerful transmissions reached the American West Coast and disrupted Navy transmissions. Station SAIL at Seattle and Station ITEM at Imperial Beach, California, reported the interference. Station US in Washington requested details of the disruptive Japanese transmissions. One of the first stations to reply was Station ITEM. Chief Radioman Martin Vandenberg, ITEM's traffic chief, investigated the interference and said it was coming from Japanese naval radio stations in Tokyo and Osaka. He wrote that all classes of navy traffic were noted and that the "reception at Station I is very good." Vandenberg gave an example of one intercept. It was addressed to the radio call sign of the Japanese battleship HIMJS Kirishima, part of the Hawaii raid force, in the urgent special cipher code.¹⁶

The broadcasts to and from the North Pacific grew in intensity and reached the radio room of the American liner Lurline, plying the Pacific between California and Hawaii.

Captain C. W. Berndtson headed the SS Lurline toward Honolulu. The luxury liner, pride of the Matson Line and synonymous with cruises to Hawaii, departed San Francisco on Saturday, November 29, slid under the Golden Gate Bridge, sailed south along the California coast, and picked up more passengers from the docks at Long Beach, the harbor for Los Angeles. The Lurline's staterooms were filled with civilian workers headed for Hawaii and Pacific isles to build up American defenses.

Leslie Grogan, the Lurline's first assistant radio operator, had little to do. Yearning for more radio work during his midnight-to-morning watch, Grogan moved the dial of his radio receiver—and discovered unusual transmissions from Japan. “The Japs are blasting away on the lower marine radio frequencies. All in the Japanese code and continues for several hours,” Grogan wrote in the Lurline's radio log.¹⁷ He noted that the broadcasts originated from shore stations in Japan and were beamed toward the Northwestern Pacific.

Grogan's next log entry is startling. He reported that Japanese ships in the North Pacific repeated the messages from the shore stations. “We noted that signals were being repeated back possibly for copying by craft with small antennas [sic].”¹⁸ The broadcasts continued for the next two nights, December 1 and 2. “We continue to pick up the bold Japanese general order signals—it can't be anything else. We got good radio direction finder bearings, mostly coming from a Northwesterly direction from our position. The Jap floating units continue their bold repetition of wireless signals, presumably for the smaller craft in their vanguard of ships. Floating units repeat the signals from JCS, the shore station.”¹⁹

Commercial radio call signs such as JCS were not normally used by Japan to address warships, but rather for commercial ships.²⁰ When Japan addressed warships, radio station JCS switched procedure and used the call sign of HA FU 6. Grogan's intercepts appear to coincide with Japanese naval messages originated by HA FU 6 (the same transmitter as JCS) and addressed to units of the Hawaii strike force, which were then proceeding eastward across the North Pacific. Grogan's account of hearing warships repeat radio messages fits in with Admiral Nagumo's radio communication plan, which called for repeating the Tokyo broadcasts for the smaller warships within the task force. The intercepted radio signals from JCS only indicated a land-based station near Tokyo. Each separate vessel had to transmit signals in order to be located by the Lurline's direction finder. Grogan understood the implications of the Japanese naval broadcasts: “We are now making a concise record to turn into the Naval Intelligence when we arrive in Honolulu, Wednesday, December 3, 1941.” Immediately upon docking at the Aloha Tower, Grogan presented his transcript of the broadcasts and the RDF bearings to Lieutenant Commander George Pease of Naval Intelligence. According to Grogan's account, Pease was a “good listener but showed little outward reflection as to what we felt was a mighty serious situation.”²¹

If Pease, who died in a plane crash in 1945, ever submitted a report on the Lurline's locating Japanese warships north of Hawaii by RDF, it has disappeared. So has the Lurline's original radio log. On December 10, the liner returned to San Francisco and Lieutenant Commander Preston Allen boarded the ship and confiscated the radio log. Allen, a member of the Twelfth Naval District intelligence unit, took the log containing the details of Grogan's interceptions to his District office. It has never been seen since. Grogan's account, quoted in this book, is based on a reconstruction of the missing log that he prepared for Matson Lines after Allen took possession of the log.

During research for this book, the author uncovered details of the Lurline log's disappearance. In the late 1970s, shortly after John Toland began research for his book, he filed an FOIA with the Navy asking to see the log. The Navy said there was no record of such a log, but a withdrawal slip in the National Archives, San Bruno, California, tells another story.²² After he took possession of the log, Lieutenant Commander Allen did not return it to Matson Lines. Instead he filed it in the voluminous records of the Port Director, Twelfth Naval District. There it remained, unknown to all Pearl Harbor investigations. In 1958, the Port Director files were turned over to the Federal Records Center [FRC] in San Bruno, a division of the National Archives.

Sometime in the 1970s someone removed the log from the National Archives and left a withdrawal slip form in its place. The caption on the slip refers to the Lurline's radio log, but it is not dated or signed—a possible felony violation of National Archives procedures. “It had to be someone connected with the Navy,” said Kathleen O'Connor, who discovered the withdrawal slip in August 1991. O'Connor, an archivist at San Bruno, told the author that the white withdrawal slip is yellowed, indicating deterioration based on a storage period of about twenty years—from about the time that Toland made his FOIA request. At the time the Lurline's log was in the physical custody of the Center but under the legal control of the Navy. The FRC is a government records center where both temporary and permanent Federal records are kept. Permanent records are eventually transferred to the National Archives' custody and opened for public access. Most FRC records are not open for public inspection. “Only naval personnel had access,” explained O'Connor.²³

She noted the “curious coincidence” of the above events. “Every federal regulation pertaining to the care and preservation of archival documents was neglected,” O'Connor said. “There is no date of withdrawal, nor any signature of the person who removed these highly significant records.”

The Lurline's radio operators weren't the only ones recording the Japanese radio “blasts.” Station SAIL at Seattle confirmed the reports of Hosmer/Ogg and the Lurline. On December 3, operators at SAIL said that strong radio signals were originating in the North Pacific. By the next day three other Navy intercept stations reported the same signals. But 98 percent of the intercepts acquired by the four Navy facilities have been hidden from public view. Included are radio messages to and from the Pearl Harbor-bound warships Kirishima, Akagi, and Tone and Admiral Nagumo, commander of the raiding force.²⁴ Radio logs of the three monitoring stations found by the author in Archives II provide the evidence.

December 4, 1941, was a busy day for Japan's powerful radio transmitters. Broadcasts to three vessels of the Hawaii-bound carrier force were detected by three US Navy monitoring stations—ITEM, CAST, and H.²⁵ Each broadcast was transmitted on long-distance frequencies. Messages to the battleship Kirishima were intercepted at Stations ITEM (San Diego) and H (Oahu). On Corregidor, Station CAST intercepted messages to the First Air Fleet and its flagship, the Akagi. At Station H radio intercept operator Henry F. Garstka wrote in his operator log that he intercepted two messages to a warship with the radio call signal of NU TO4. According to Garstka's log entry,²⁶ the message came from Radio Yokosuka, who kept asking, "Kan?, Kan?," which was a Japanese naval communication procedure meaning: "Can you hear me, and if so, please answer." The warship did not answer and for a good reason. NU TO 4 was the heavy cruiser HIMJS Tone, and the supersecret call sign was reserved for the Hawaii attack. The cruiser was part of the First Air Fleet—Japan's Pearl Harbor raiding force. The Tone's captain wisely did not answer, for Radio Yokosuka violated Japanese communication security. It made a mistake in jump-starting the secret Hawaii list—it was not to be used, presumably, until the day of the attack. While Garstka did not identify NU TO 4 as the Tone, it proves Radio Yokosuka was a gross violator of Yamamoto's radio silence order. And Henry Garstka's intercept of NUTO4 provides firm evidence that warships of the Pearl Harbor force were addressed by radio before the raid started and intercepted by US Navy monitoring stations.

Garstka intercepted the broadcast on a long-distance radio frequency used by Japan to contact individual ships and shore stations.²⁷ It was one of many Japanese communication procedures that enabled US intercept operators to estimate the warships' general location. Three distinct communication procedures were generally used: (1) "All Points" broadcasts for the entire Japanese navy; (2) shore to ship and vice versa; and (3) ship to ship.

The "All Points" broadcasts were sent over a vast radio network used by Tokyo to issue orders to commands in the Western and Central Pacific Ocean regions and areas of the Far East under Japanese naval control. Regular time schedules were maintained and Japanese radio operators assigned to diverse units copied the broadcasts, which contained general information for various commands. American cryptographers called these transmissions the "UTU Broadcasts." Japan set aside the frequencies of 4155, 8310, and 16,620 kilocycles for the exclusive use of the UTU transmissions. Prime time started at midnight on 4155 kilocycles, then switched to 8310 for the predawn hours and continued throughout daylight on 16,620 kilocycles. As twilight approached the switch was made to 8310, then 4155, etc. These UTU schedules continued twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week. Every Japanese naval command received general orders from the UTU broadcasts. Other eager listeners were the US Navy's intercept operators at CAST and H. As war neared, Japan set up additional UTU frequencies when the regular radio circuits became overloaded. Although the overload broadcasts did not necessarily provide locations for the warships or air units, they did indicate that her navy was gearing up for some kind of drastic operation, as Homer Kisner dutifully reported in his Chronology of December 4, 1941.²⁸

An entirely different communication procedure provided US Navy intercept operators with the general location of warships and merchant vessels. This procedure is called point-to-point broadcasting and involved reserved frequencies. Each major Japanese naval base had its own set of frequencies. So when intercept operator Henry Garstka of Station H intercepted radio transmissions from the Yokosuka naval base's point-to-point broadcast, that intercept disclosed that the Tone was a great distance away in the North Pacific. Garstka noted that Yokosuka beamed the message on the long-distance frequency of 12,690 kilocycles. There was no other rational analysis in determining her location. If she had been in the Western or Central Pacific, naval radio station transmitters at Sasebo, Saipan, or Takao would have been used to contact the warship. It was a communication intelligence error by Radio Yokosuka and was recognized as such by the captain of the cruiser, who did not respond.²⁹

In the same December 4 Chronology where he predicted Japan's navy was preparing for drastic action, Homer Kisner of Station H reported that "The Carriers are believed to have remained in the vicinity of Kyushu [the southernmost of the main islands of Japan]."³⁰ But which carriers? The Third Fleet carriers of Carrier Divisions Three and Four or the First Air Fleet's Carrier Divisions One, Two and Five—which, at the time, were in the North Pacific headed for Hawaii? Those questions were posed to Kisner by the author during interviews in April 1988 and April 1998.³¹ "I was locating the Third Fleet carriers," Kisner said of the December 4 Chronology. He maintained that his locations were consistent. Since early November 1941 his daily Chronology linked Carrier Divisions Three and Four with the Southeast Asia movement organized by the commander of the Third Fleet in the area of Kyushu and the port of Sasebo.

Kisner pointed to his Chronology of November 20, where he placed the warships of Cruiser Division Eight, Destroyer Squadron One, with the Carrier Commands [Kisner's capitalization].³² He admitted that by late in the day of Friday, December 5, the locations of the Japanese warships had been obscured by Japan's communication procedures. But the obfuscation didn't fool Kisner. He analyzed the broadcasts of Radio Saipan (Central Pacific), Radio Takao (Philippines and Southeast Asia), and

Radio Ominato (North Pacific) and wrote that the “method of delivering the [Japanese fleet] messages tends to keep unknown the position of vessels afloat.” He predicted that “Japan’s navy operations were near a war-time basis.”³³ It was the unknown positions of the vessels afloat between Hawaii, Saipan, and Ominato that worried Kisner, according to his April 1998 interview with the author. “I came to the conclusion they were going to jump us.”³⁴

Japanese navy officers involved in the Pearl Harbor attack insist that the carrier fleet of Divisions One, Two, and Five were on total radio silence and developed a fallback position to deflect questions on their location. They say American monitoring stations heard deceptive broadcasts originated by Japanese naval air stations that pretended to be the Akagi and other vessels. Captain Sadatoshi Tomioka provided details. “The Main Force in the Inland Sea and land-based air units carried out deceptive communication to indicate the carriers were training in the Kyushu area.”³⁵

Tomioka’s assertions were backed by the first witness before the 1945–46 Congressional investigation. On November 15, 1945, Admiral T. B. Inglis said Japan used deceptive³⁶ radio broadcasts and simulated the presence of carriers in the Inland Sea prior to the attack. But he gave no details and did not produce a single intercept indicating deceptive messages. Admiral Kimmel’s intelligence chief Edwin Layton gave Congress two contradictory stories. He told the Army Board in 1944 that “the Japanese practiced radio deception.” Then in his 1985 book he wrote, “Contrary to popular myth and the assumption of many historians, there was no sustained deception plan put into operation by Japan.” Layton had gotten it right the second time. No real examples have ever been located. If radio deception was attempted by Japan, it was inept and soon discovered.³⁷

Radioman First Class Paul E. Seaward of Station H reported hearing naval air stations at Kanoya, Omura, and Yokosuka in radio contact with a call sign of 1 NI KU on December 5 and 6. Whoever they were attempting to contact—or whether it was an attempt at deception—remains a mystery. The call sign was not assigned to any of Japan’s aircraft carriers, battleships, or cruisers with the First Air Fleet.³⁸

American intercept operators were not duped. The ruse (if it occurred) was recognized instantly. On America’s West Coast, Navy interception operations at Station SAIL and Station AE at Sitka, Alaska, discovered the false signals. Radioman First Class Fred R. Thomson, the Navy’s Sitka traffic chief, wrote that they came from the radio station attached to the Japanese naval air base at Kasumigaura, 34 miles northwest of Tokyo. The air station sent a radio message to a fleet unit, then pretended to receive a reply.³⁹ Thomson detected the sham when Kasumigaura used the same transmitter for the response. In effect, Kasumigaura was talking to itself. In his oral history interview, Joseph Rochefort said that none of his officers or operators were fooled by Japanese radio deception: “It is awfully difficult to deceive a trained counter-communications intelligence organization, awfully difficult.”⁴⁰

A PRETTY CHEAP PRICE

DECEMBER 1–6, 1941

IN HIS POSTWAR TESTIMONY TO CONGRESS, ADMIRAL HUSBAND Kimmel maintained that he would have been ready to defend Pearl Harbor . . . “if I had anything which indicated to me the probability of an attack on Hawaii.”¹ The information that Kimmel needed was available—so available, in fact, that it often appears as though the Japanese had made few efforts to conceal it. As we now know, Lieutenant Commanders Joseph Rochefort and Edwin Layton could have provided that indication, but they did not do so.

Their failure allowed Japan’s First Air Fleet to make its surprise attack and then to escape to Japan. In a postwar assessment of the attack Rochefort said, “It was a pretty cheap price to pay for unifying the country.” But others would angrily question that conclusion.²

Seven Japanese naval broadcasts intercepted between November 28 and December 6 confirmed that Japan intended to start the war and that it would begin at Pearl Harbor. The evidence that poured into American intelligence stations is overpowering. All the broadcasts have one common denominator: none ever reached Admiral Kimmel. The Navy’s head cryptographer in Hawaii developed an excuse. It is a powerful statement that has assured the American and Japanese people that indeed Japan’s navy observed radio silence and never divulged in any manner that Pearl Harbor was the target. “There is not the slightest reason to believe that JN-25 or any other navy system contained anything that would have forecast the attack.” This assurance came from Lieutenant Commander Thomas Dyer, second in command and chief cryptographer at Station HYPO, in a letter to the author on June 4, 1983.³ But in the Station H records there were plenty of indicators found, in the form of intercepted Japanese broadcasts.

The first of these came on November 28, when Tokyo Naval Radio transmitted a message in the 5-Num code to the First Air Fleet. It warned that the warships could expect a powerful winter storm in their path. Aerographers of the Imperial Navy had located several low-pressure centers in the North Pacific.⁴ Each low indicated the presence of storm conditions that were steering Siberian polar winds in a southerly direction to meet up with the Kuroshio Current—Japan’s Gulf Stream.⁵ For centuries, mariners knew that the warm waters of the Kuroshio or Black Current, which originated in the East China Sea, became storm catapults once they reached the North Pacific and clashed with cold Arctic air south of the Kamchatka Peninsula and Alaska’s Aleutian Islands. Carried eastward by the high-altitude winds of the jet stream, these storm systems deliver heavy rains and snow packs to the United States and Canada. The intensity of the storms can be ferocious, often resulting in the monstrous forty-foot waves that break on the north-facing shores of all the Hawaiian Islands.

Radio operators within the Japanese First Air Fleet didn’t need the warning—the storm was already roiling the stomachs of many crew members. Soon the storm slowed the forward speed of the entire thirty-one-vessel fleet and scattered the warships over a fifty-mile area at 42 degrees of north latitude near the international date line. From the deck of the light cruiser Abukuma, flagship of Destroyer Squadron One, Petty Officer Iki Kuromoti described the scene in near-haiku style: “The weather grows worse, a gale blows, the seas rage, a dense fog descends. In this bitter weather, a show of actual force, a test by the gods. Though tossed about in their struggle with the elements, the ships continue on their glorious way.” Kuromoti said men were washed overboard and signal flags were blown away. “Without sleep, and by the silent struggle with nature every man was completely exhausted by continuous watches. Our spirits were buoyed that we were soon to strike the first blow in this greatest of all wars.”⁶

By November 30, the storm’s fury had subsided and Admiral Chuichi Nagumo decided to round up his warships. Blinker light signals were out of the question. Driven off course by the typhoon-force winds, warships and tankers were scattered beyond the fifteen-mile horizon line, out of sight and unreachable by light signals. Radio was the only means to return the First

Air Fleet to its tight formation. With the Akagi's transmitter tuned to 4960 kilocycles, the carrier sent out broadcasts to the strays and directed them back to the task force. Since the broadcasts were intended for ships relatively close by, the radio operators set the transmitters on low power—a communication procedure that limited their signal range to about a hundred miles.⁷

But another storm was forming millions of miles away on the surface of the sun. In a sunstorm or solar storm, ions created on the sun's surface bombard the earth's atmosphere, wreaking havoc with radio transmissions.⁸ These sunstorms distort electronic communications and create what is called the northern lights or aurora borealis, which can be observed in the earth's higher latitudes. (The southern counterpart is called the southern lights or aurora australis.) Radio signals—even those generated by low transmitter power—can be bounced halfway across the earth's surface by the quirks of solar storms. A radio receiver thousands of miles from a transmitter can sometimes clearly hear a broadcast while a similar receiver a short distance away draws a blank.

The Akagi radiomen were not aware that one of the largest solar storms of the century was taking place as they continued on their glorious journey. They were confident that low-power tactical frequencies, limited to a few miles, would be secure. There was no way, they believed, that American, English, and Dutch eavesdroppers would hear the messages.

Admiral Nagumo's round-up directions were transmitted to the flagships within the First Air Fleet. There was a designated command flagship for each type of vessel—battleships and cruisers, destroyers, and the oil tankers. Each flagship, known as a type commander, served as a communications sentinel for its type of vessel. The Kirishima was the flagship for the battleships and heavy cruisers, the Akagi for the carriers. The destroyers relied on radio orders from the Abukuma; the oil tankers, from the Kyokuto Maru. Homer Kisner of Station H told the author that the type of the broadcasts provided clues to his staff that enabled them to penetrate Japan's hostile plans. He referred to the flagship system as the "mother hen and chickens" breakthrough. "It enabled us to first identify who was bossiest, then who was being bossed," Kisner said. He gave the Abukuma as an example. "If a single warship continually talks to the same vessels, obviously it is the controlling authority."⁹

Nagumo's orders to gather the scattered task force were first transmitted to the command flagships within the First Air Fleet. Then the orders were repeated to the "chicks." An important vessel was the Kyokuto Maru, flagship of the seven-tanker fuel train. The tanker was first spotted for Admiral Kimmel in Rochefort's Communications Summary (COMSUM) of October 9, 1941. In the summary the tanker was associated with what became the thirty-one vessels of the Japanese Pearl Harbor force. Writing that the warships had been fairly prominent during the last part of September and early October 1941, Rochefort identified the commands (the mother hens): Battleship Division 3, Commander Carriers (Admiral Nagumo), Destroyer Squadron 1, Cruiser Division 8, and the Kyukuto Maru. He also listed the Commander of the First and Second Fleets and the oiler Tsurumi, which eventually were attached to the opening salvos of the Southeast Asia campaign.¹⁰ By mid-November, the staff had solved the tanker's code-movement reports and associated the vessel with the First Air Fleet.¹¹ In what Kisner later called "a remarkable bit of intelligence," he placed the commanding officer of the Kyokuto Maru aboard the carrier Kaga on October 27. Admiral Kimmel saw and initialed the unusual report the next morning.¹²

Throughout the weekend of November 28–30, the solar storm bounced the Akagi's radio transmissions across the Pacific to US Navy intercept stations on Oahu, Alaska, and America's West Coast and to the SS Lurline. Kimmel was informed of the Akagi broadcasts by Rochefort's report dated November 30. The admiral read the warning on the morning of December 2 and asked his intelligence officer, Edwin Layton: "Where are the carriers?" Layton said he didn't know. With a twinkle in his eye, Kimmel asked, "Could they be rounding Diamond Head?" Layton's reply was, "I hope they would have been discovered before then."¹³ But Layton may not have been completely frank. He said that Japan's Carrier Divisions One and Two had not been heard from for at least fifteen to twenty-five days—starting from mid-November. He then expanded the falsification: "Neither the carriers, carrier division commanders or the carrier commander-in-chief [Nagumo] had been addressed in any of the thousands of messages that came out of the Naval General Staff. In addition, no traffic [radio transmissions] had been originated by the carriers."¹⁴

Joseph Rochefort of Station HYPO backed up Layton, claiming that from December 1 onward "We lost our knowledge of their activities and their position because they had gone on radio silence." On the eve of the attack he told Kimmel, "Carriers are lost, carriers not heard." Later in 1946, during the Pearl Harbor investigation, Rochefort modified his statement, testifying on February 15, 1946, that he had "located them in a negative sense."¹⁵

Homer Kisner told the author that bearing locations obtained by the radio direction finder operators were part of the complete intelligence bundle he delivered each day to Station HYPO. Until the end of October, RDF reports were included in intelligence summaries sent to both Kimmel and the White House. But beginning November 1, the RDF reports were omitted from the summaries delivered to Kimmel. When shown the omissions by the author in 1988, Kisner was astounded. "Who held them back? They should have gone to the admiral!" he said.

Why were the RDF reports missing from Admiral Kimmel's copy? Rochefort's original Communications Summaries were found by the author stored among Navy records in the National Archives, but all the RDF reports for November and December 1941 were crudely cut from the copy of each report that had been prepared for Kimmel. Every RDF fix had been excised sometime after Kisner delivered the complete ports to Station HYPO. No one at the National Archives could explain the deletions. When were they cut? Before they were delivered to the admiral? Did the deletions trigger the “Where are the carriers” question Kimmel directed to Layton?

In 1993, the deletion questions were posed to Richard A. von Doenhoff, a specialist in the Pearl Harbor section of the National Archives. He confirmed that more than sixty-five of Rochefort’s November and December Summaries intended for Kimmel had been mutilated. Von Doenhoff wrote the author that the RDF pages which listed Japanese warship locations had been cut prior to the start of the 1945 Congressional Hearings. “We examined the Fourteenth Naval District Communication Summaries and found that those summaries had indeed been cut off from the bottom of the pages. We have no idea why this was done, but it appears that the documents were entered into evidence during 1945 and 46 in this manner.”¹⁶

So began the myth of the radio silence of the Japanese carrier force. It is a myth that has endured for over fifty years and that continues to baffle historians. In 1995 Stephen Ambrose, one of America’s most distinguished historians, excoriated the pre-Pearl Harbor intelligence when he wrote: “It was simply terrible. In late November, intelligence ‘lost’ the Japanese aircraft carrier fleet,” Ambrose wrote. He repeated this charge in the Wall Street Journal in May 1999.¹⁷

Layton’s claim about the carrier commands’ radio silence does not hold up to scrutiny. There were 129 Japanese naval intercepts obtained by US naval monitor stations between November 15 and December 6 that directly contradict Layton’s figures. The intercept rate can be documented from the records of Stations CAST and H. For the 21-day period, it averages 6.3 intercepts per day. All categories of Japanese carriers and carrier commands cited by Layton as on radio silence either originated radio broadcasts or received messages during the three-week period, according to an analysis of the intercepts conducted by the Navy’s 1941 radio traffic experts, Captain Duane Whitlock of Station CAST and Homer Kisner of Station H.¹⁸

Kisner’s reports and intercepts collected in Hawaii have been preserved. The intercepts gathered by Whitlock’s operators after mid-November 1941 were burned so they would not fall into the hands of the Japanese troops that were advancing on Corregidor in the spring of 1942. An exception was Station CAST’s radio direction finder reports, which were sent to Hawaii over the US Navy’s TESTM radio circuit before the attack.¹⁹

During separate interviews with the author, Kisner and Whitlock identified the 129 intercepts that refute Layton’s claim of radio silence. Whitlock analyzed the radio direction finder reports obtained by Station CAST, and Kisner analyzed the intercepts obtained by his operators at Station H. The 129 reports, dated during the 21-day period, were compiled by the author from three sources found in Archives II: (1) Japanese naval intercepts, (2) Japanese code movement reports filed by warships, and (3) the TESTM radio direction finder reports obtained by Station CAST. Admiral Nagumo, the commander-in-chief of the Hawaii-bound force, was the most talkative. He originated nearly half of all Japanese naval radio broadcasts intercepted by the US Navy monitoring stations. The author compiled the seven categories of intercepts:

A. Radio transmissions by Admiral Nagumo:	60
B. Tokyo radio to the vessels of the First Air Fleet:	24
C. Broadcasts originated by carriers:	20
D. Broadcasts originated by Carrier Division Commanders:	12
E. Messages originated by vessels attached to the First Air Fleet, but were not carriers:	8
F. Messages originated by the Midway Neutralization Unit:	4
G. Tokyo radio to individual Carrier Division Commanders:	1

129²⁰

Radio silence was ignored as more Japanese naval broadcasts hit the airwaves. The first military intercept that specified Pearl Harbor as the target came from Japan’s highest naval commander, Admiral Osami Nagano, Chief of the Imperial Navy General Headquarters. He breached security in a radio broadcast and disclosed that a Japanese carrier strike force would attack Hawaii. The broadcast was beamed from Tokyo to the communications officer of the Eleventh Air Fleet, a powerful naval air command based on Formosa, composed of 500 bombers and fighters that had been massed for an aerial attack on General MacArthur’s command in the Philippines and other objectives in Southeast Asia.

Nagano’s broadcast was first publicly disclosed in a postwar article written by Commander Koiichi Shimada, an air officer of the Eleventh Air Fleet, who wrote that his command received a radio dispatch from Imperial General Headquarters packed with highly secret information. The message said:

IMPERIAL HEADQUARTERS IS QUITE CONFIDENT OF SUCCESS IN JAMMING THE ENEMY’S RADIO FREQUENCIES SO THAT ANY

WARREN DISPATCHED TO THE PHILIPPINES AS A RESULT OF THE CARRIER STRIKING FORCE'S ATTACK ON HAWAII WILL NOT GET THROUGH. MEANWHILE, IN ORDER TO ASSURE SUCCESS OF THE HAWAII ATTACK, IT IS IMPERATIVE THAT ELEVENTH AIR FLEET IN FORMOSA TAKE EVERY PRECAUTION TO GUARD AGAINST THE ENEMY'S LEARNING OF OUR MILITARY MOVEMENTS BEFORE THE ATTACK TAKES PLACE.²¹

The disclosures contained in this Tokyo-to-Formosa broadcast are confounding. Why would Japan's top naval officer abandon basic radio security? An even more important question for the Pacific Fleet: Was the broadcast intercepted by US Navy cryptographers, or was Commander Dyer of HYPO correct in asserting that Japan did not transmit a single message naming Pearl Harbor as the target?

Although Shimada provided few communication details of Nagano's broadcast, he indicated that it was received on a Tokyo-Formosa radio circuit before the attack. He suggested the date was before December 5, 1941, Formosa Time. The broadcast is another of Pearl Harbor's mysteries. No transcript of it was found in President Carter's 1979 release of Japanese naval intercepts, nor was it discussed by any Pearl Harbor investigation. Since the message dealt with Japanese plans to disrupt American radio-receiving facilities of General MacArthur and Admiral Hart, the author looked for Tokyo radio messages directed to the Eleventh Air Fleet's communication officer in Formosa. Station H in Hawaii kept a daily log of messages dispatched to Japanese commands. These messages are listed in that log as the UTU broadcast schedule. Each UTU log discloses Japanese communications details, but not the message text. The text—in either navy code or plain language—was recorded on a separate message sheet. Entries in the UTU log contain the Japanese originator and the intended receiver of each message, as well as the radio frequency, the time of the intercept in Tokyo Time, and the initials of the Station H intercept operator.

In the Japanese navy's radio-address code (Yobidashi Fugo), the suffix 49 always designated the staff communications (radiotelegraphy) officer of each command. The suffix code never changed. The November 1941 radio code address for the communications officer of the Eleventh Air Fleet was SU YO 449; it changed to SI HA 149 on December 1. Japanese attempts to mask the change didn't work. American cryptographers at CAST saw through Japan's disguise and instantly identified the new name for the Eleventh Air Fleet. They sent a TESTM dispatch to Hawaii on December 4 (Manila Time) and named the five new radio call signs: "Idents for Eleventh Air Fleet: HI ME 6, MO NO 1, RE HE 8, SI HA 1, YO NO 1."²²

A message sent by Radio Tokyo to SI HA 149 in the UTU log for December 4 (Formosa Time; December 3 in Hawaii) used the same radio call—"idents"—provided by Station CAST. The log tells this story: on December 3, Station H operator CU heard a message sent to the communications staff officer of the Eleventh Air Fleet. CU intercepted the message at 7:45 A.M., entered the communication details of the message in the UTU log book, typed the Japanese text on a separate message sheet, and sent both on their way to Admiral Kimmel.²³

As with the other crucial intercepts of the week, there is no record that the message ever reached Kimmel. Yet there is firm evidence that Nagano's message was intercepted in Hawaii. In his Chronology for December 4, Homer Kisner noted that the Communications Division in Tokyo sent high-precedence messages to "general collective calls." One was SI HA 149, the communication officer of the Eleventh Air Fleet. Except for CU and Commander Shimada, no one in America has admitted seeing the original message that names Pearl Harbor as the target for a carrier attack. Extraordinary secrecy surrounds the intercept. None of the SI HA 149 intercepts have been released.

There were many more clues. Another radio broadcast placed the Japanese submarine I-10 off American Samoa in the South Pacific. On December 4, Tokyo Time, the sub reconnoitered the small US Navy base at Pago Pago on American Samoa, a United States possession of several islands about 1500 miles east of Australia in the South Pacific, and launched a small scouting aircraft on a reconnaissance mission. When the plane, believed to be a float plane converted for submarine operation, failed to return, I-10 broke radio silence, contacted the commander of the submarine fleet, and reported it missing.²⁴ The broadcast originated within easy intercept range of Station VICTOR, a Navy direction finder station at Pago Pago. VICTOR, named for the small village of Vaitogi, operated around the clock, obtaining radio direction finder fixes of Japanese naval units in the South and Central Pacific. RDF fixes obtained by VICTOR were radioed immediately to Joseph Rochefort's office at HYPO in Pearl Harbor. Yet Rochefort testified that he never received anything from VICTOR. National Archives documents in San Bruno, California, contradict him. So does one of his assistants, Lieutenant Commander Thomas Huckins, who wrote that VICTOR "has been giving excellent service as a strategic DF station."²⁵

There are 300 pages of RDF fixes that were originated by VICTOR between July and December 1941 locked in Archives II vaults at College Park, Maryland. Another set of documents at San Bruno traces them to Rochefort's office in Hawaii. But neither set of VICTOR documents has been released as of the writing of this book.

The I-10 transmission demonstrates the wide disregard of radio silence by Japan's navy. A captured Japanese communication document obtained in 1944 by the Pacific Strategic Intelligence Section is the source. According to the translation by PSIS, the broadcast reporting the loss of the scout plane was transmitted by the sub on December 4, but gave no communication details. Confirmation of the broadcast can be attributed to the commander of the Japanese submarine fleet, Vice Admiral Mitsumi Shimizu, who used the radio call sign FU NE 44 to contact Tokyo, according to Station H records. Admiral Shimizu, who at the time was aboard his flagship in the Marshall Islands at Jaluit Atoll, used the UTU long-distance daytime frequency of 16,620 kilocycles. His message was intercepted by Stanley Gramblin, Radioman Second Class, at 2:59 P.M. Wednesday, December 3, at Station H in Hawaii. There is no mention of the I-10 broadcast in Rochefort's Communication Summary presented to Kimmel on December 4 or 5. Nor was Gramblin's intercept found in President Carter's release.²⁶

Not all of the information available to the intelligence community was mysterious or subtle. Contrary to cryptologist Dyer's assertions, Japanese naval messages did confirm that war was near. Two such messages were on Dyer's desk or inside the HYPO office on December 6, Hawaii Time. Vice Admiral Shigeyoshi Inoue, commander of the Fourth Fleet in the Central Pacific, informed his forces by radio that a declaration of war was imminent. His radio message was intercepted by Henry F. Garstka at Station H at 8:40 P.M. on Friday, December 5, and included in Kisner's bundle, which was given to Dyer at 1:00 P.M. the next day, but was never delivered to Admiral Kimmel. According to Garstka's intercept, Inoue sent the war message as high-precedence information to ten of his Central Pacific commands including the Maizuru Special Landing Force, an amphibious unit of Japanese marines scheduled to invade and seize Wake Island. A 1946 English translation of the intercept indicates that it was encoded in JN-25-B. But in 1941 there was no such American or Japanese code designator. Verification of the code system is impossible because of American censorship of Garstka's original documents.²⁷

Inoue began:

A SPECIAL MESSAGE ON THE OCCASION OF THE DECLARATION OF WAR, TO ALL UNDER MY COMMAND.

About two hours later, Inoue repeated the war declaration dispatch. Again it was intercepted in Hawaii by a different operator, LF, and included in the Kisner intelligence bundle delivered to Dyer.²⁸

Most Japanese naval intercepts in President Carter's 1979 release contain interception details, but not Inoue's war message. Two omissions—which appear deliberate—wipe out the intercept's link to Hawaii before the attack: (1) There is no record that the message was intercepted at Station H, and (2) the initials of the intercept operator are missing. Without these two details for guidance, the Pearl Harbor investigators had no way to learn that Inoue's war declaration dispatch was intercepted in Hawaii. The author learned the intercept details from Garstka's radio log after it was declassified in January 1995.

Another radio message, issued jointly by Admiral Yamamoto and Emperor Hirohito, announced Japanese war intentions during the early morning hours of Saturday, December 6, Hawaii Time. Similar to the Inoue dispatch, it was intercepted in Hawaii but never delivered to Kimmel. It was dispatched in two parts, twenty-four hours prior to the Hawaii attack, and directly links Emperor Hirohito with the Japanese war moves. An English version of the message, released by President Carter in 1979, lists the intercept date as December 7, 1941—but that date is per Tokyo Time. American censors have not released the original two parts nor disclosed whether the messages are in code or in plain language.

The true intercept details of the Hirohito–Yamamoto dispatch can be found in the Station H logs. Emperor Hirohito issued an Imperial Rescript, which was transmitted to the Combined Fleet, urging the officers and men to “annihilate the enemy.” Admiral Yamamoto told the Combined Fleet that he received the Rescript from the Emperor on Tuesday, December 2 (Hawaii Time), and was passing it on to every officer and man “prior to declaration of war.” True to his word, Yamamoto set the broadcast release time of the Rescript at midnight, December 7, Tokyo Time, about twenty-four hours before the war's scheduled start. (Midnight Tokyo Time on December 7 was 4:30 A.M. on Saturday, December 6, in Hawaii.) Due to a mix-up his chief of staff, Rear Admiral Matome Ugaki, authorized the first broadcast two hours early, at 2:45 A.M. Hawaii Time.²⁹ It was transmitted throughout the Pacific to Japanese units. The cruiser Aoba confirmed receiving the message on December 7, Tokyo Time, while anchored in the Bonin Islands.³⁰

Radio operators at Station H intercepted the Hirohito–Yamamoto messages directly off the naval airwaves during the five-hour period. Admiral Ugaki's premature broadcast was obtained by operator Maynard Albertson, a Radioman Second Class. Two hours later, at 4:45 A.M. on December 6, Hawaii Time, Yamamoto took over the airwaves and repeated the dispatches to the Combined Fleet and the carriers of the First Air Fleet.

By 8:30 A.M. on December 6, Hawaii Time, seven duplicates of the Hirohito–Yamamoto message had been intercepted and transcribed at Station H in Hawaii by Albertson and his relief, Radioman Third Class Jesse Randle. The four that Albertson intercepted entered America's communication pipeline around 9:00 A.M. when they were turned in to Kisner. Randle's intercepts (repeats of Albertson's) didn't enter the pipeline until the following morning, at the height of the attack.

As is the case with a huge amount of intercepts and documents still sequestered by Secret classification, the Defense Department continues to deny access to the seven Hirohito–Yamamoto messages. Only the one English version with the misleading December 7 date has been publicly released. None of the seven message sheets prepared by Albertson and Randle at Station H before the attack have been declassified.³¹

By late morning on December 6, Hawaii Time, Captain Homer Kisner had finished his analysis of the intercepts, including Albertson's report of Hirohito's declaration of war, and prepared a two-page report which warned that Japan's navy was on a wartime footing. Kisner accurately identified three areas of potential hostile Japanese action: (1) massing of Japanese warships and aircraft of the Eleventh Air Fleet around the Philippines and Southeast Asia, (2) arrival of the Japanese submarine force, including its commander, at Jaluit in the Marshall Islands, and (3) two identical Tokyo naval broadcasts that were aimed at ships a great distance from Japan.

Kisner did not mention any of the Japanese carriers in the report. Asked why by the author in 1988, Kisner said his policy was to stick with verified communication data of the carriers. His last verification took place on December 2 before Pearl Harbor and involved the three carriers associated with the invasion forces heading for Southeast Asia. That estimate held until new information came over the airwaves. As for the six carriers of the First Air Fleet, Kisner said he placed them operating with Destroyer Squadron One and Cruiser Division Eight on November 20, and since he had no contradictory evidence, left them there as he prepared his report on the morning of December 6.³²

Kisner grasped the full impact of Japan's communication procedures disclosed in the overnight naval broadcasts. After completing his analysis about noon on December 6, he prepared his daily written report. He fully expected that what turned out as his last peacetime report would be delivered to Admiral Kimmel. It included this prophesy based on Japan's naval broadcasts: "The use of this method of delivering messages tends to keep unknown the positions of vessels afloat, and is probably one of the first steps toward placing the operations of the [Japanese] Navy on a war-time basis." In 1998, Kisner explained the "wartime" comment in a video interview: "From reading the messages between radio stations and ships which were between us and Tokyo, I came to the conclusion based on leaked words in the message that the Japanese were moving toward Pearl Harbor and were going to jump us." By "leaked words" Kisner meant that he and the radiocryptographers at H were able to understand enough of the coded Japanese naval text to make sense of the messages—but after fifty-seven years he could not recall the exact details. "One thing is for sure," he said. "That's the only time I ever forecast war with Japan."³³

Following his usual custom, Kisner jumped into his pick-up truck and drove the intelligence bundle to Station HYPO. On the way he passed by the Japanese consulate, where spy Tadashi Morimura had just sent his message indicating that Pearl Harbor lay helpless before a surprise attack. When Kisner delivered his intelligence bundle to the basement cryptology center for the Pacific Fleet, he noted that Joseph Rochefort had left. In his place stood Lieutenant Commander Thomas Dyer, second in command at the station. Joseph Rochefort, exhausted by the week's work, had left HYPO at noon; he returned to his home in the Honolulu hills behind the University of Hawaii, about ten miles from Pearl Harbor, and took the rest of the weekend off.

Kisner left the intelligence bundle containing his war warning on Dyer's desk. The bundle went no further. Though it was on the top of the package, Dyer did not pass the war warning to Kimmel. Instead, the bundle of 900 intercepts, including the four "annihilate the enemy" and declaration-of-war messages originated by Emperor Hirohito and Admiral Yamamoto, remained untouched. Dyer later claimed in a letter to the author that only he and a yeoman staffed Station HYPO after the weekend liberty began at noon. The other twenty-six cryptographers and linguists were given the weekend off. "There were not enough warm bodies left," he wrote to the author in 1983.³⁴

Granted the station was short of staff, it still seems clear that Dyer should have read Kisner's war warning and passed it on to Kimmel and the fleet. A phone call to the weekend duty officer of the fleet, reciting Kisner's war warning, might have changed the course of events. Reminded of his war warning in 1998, Kisner said that if he had to do it all over again he would have personally notified Kimmel's duty officer.

As Japanese warships headed eastward through the Pacific toward the Pacific Fleet, there were more disclosures of the Japanese fleet's destination, including one from the oil tanker HIMJS Shiriya. During the evening watch on Sunday, November 30, Hawaii Time, a radio operator at Station H intercepted a movement-report message from the Shiriya's captain: "This ship is proceeding direct to a position 30-00 North, 154-20 East. Expect to arrive that point at 1800 on December 3. Thereafter, will proceed eastward along the 30-degree north latitude line at a speed of 7 knots." As every chart of the Pacific Ocean shows, the 30th degree of north latitude leads directly to Midway Island.³⁵

The Shiriya's original radio message is difficult to trace in American records. Though it was intercepted at Station H, it is impossible to identify the intercept operator. His initials have been removed from an English version released by President Carter's 1979 executive order. The code system used by the Shiriya's captain is also blacked out, but since the radio dispatch is essentially a movement report it is presumably in Japan's naval-movement code system. Vice Admiral William "Bull" Halsey was not too far from the tanker. Halsey was aboard the USS Enterprise, about 500 miles south of the Shiriya, on December 3, delivering twelve fighter planes to Wake Island as a reinforcement for the Marine air group protecting the island. Though Halsey conducted aerial searches out to 300 miles from his Task Group, his scout planes missed the Shiriya and her destroyer escort.³⁶

Following the radio exchange between the Akagi and her tankers on November 30, Station H operators began an intense search for more broadcasts. Radio transmissions to the tankers appear prominently in the log books of H starting December 3, Hawaii Time. Radio Tokyo attempted to contact the ships on the great-distance frequency but none responded. However, the powerful transmissions directed to the tankers' radio receivers carried throughout the Pacific Basin and were intercepted at Station SAIL near Seattle.

Tokyo's broadcast to the tankers disclosed important intelligence for Admiral Kimmel. According to Kisner, "We didn't need to fully decrypt messages. As long as we had the ship's identity, Japan's communication procedure to the tankers told the story. Stepping up the daytime radio frequencies from 11,000 kilocycles to above 16,000 kilocycles indicated a progressive eastern movement from Japan."³⁷

The long-distance frequency showed that Japan's navy was refueling warships at sea—far from local oil reserves available in the Empire or at naval bases in the Formosa region. Earlier in November, the tankers had been linked with all six carriers of the First Air Fleet in radio dispatches. Kimmel was told that Kisner's operators placed the captain of the Kyokuto Maru (the flagship of the tankers) in conferences held aboard the carrier Kaga. Though it is obvious that the tankers practiced refueling at sea with the six flattops of Carrier Divisions One, Two, and Five in early November, the idea that the real thing was underway in early December north of Hawaii never occurred to Admiral Kimmel and his staff.

Over the weekend of November 28–30 diplomatic negotiations between America and Japan collapsed when the United States presented a calculated ten-point proposal that called for settling relations. Japan, according to Rochefort, was backed into a corner with no place to go—a situation forecast by Arthur McCollum fourteen months earlier. In Hawaii, Rochefort recognized Japan's dilemma. "Anyone who knew anything about the Japanese or things Japanese would have said that when we sent the November 26 letter you better run up the red flag. I believe sincerely that the November 26 message was an actual ultimatum the Japanese could not accept and their only alternative was to go to war."³⁸

The American proposal insisted that Japan renounce the war with China, renounce their Tripartite Pact with Germany and Italy, and renounce the economic plan for Southeast Asia called the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere. Secretary of State Cordell Hull presented the proposal to Ambassador Nomura late in the afternoon of November 26. It contained ten points that Hull called a modus vivendi (temporary agreement).³⁹ Two of the points angered Japan: point 3, "The Government of Japan will withdraw all military, naval, air and police forces from China and from Indo-China," and point 4, "The Government of the United States and the Government of Japan will not support—militarily, politically, economically—any government or regime in China other than the National Government of the Republic of China with the capital temporarily at Chungking." FDR held views similar to Rochefort's on Japan's reaction. In a handwritten note to Hull, the President said he regarded the proposal as fair but did not believe that Japan would agree. "I am not very hopeful and we must all be prepared for real trouble, possibly soon."⁴⁰

From Japan's point of view, renouncing the war in China was impossible. It would have turned the nation's back on hundreds of thousands of Japanese military personnel who had been killed or wounded in the four years of fighting there. To abandon either the Tripartite Pact or the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere would have been equally difficult for Japan. Japanese officials felt that their nation's survival depended upon access to the natural resources of Southeast Asia. And her only governmental friends in the world were Germany and Italy.

Emperor Hirohito and his council of advisors, the Liaison Conference, responded to the ultimatum by giving the go-ahead to Admiral Yamamoto: start the war on Monday, December 8, 1941—Tokyo Time. Yamamoto then sent a message using a prearranged phrase to the Combined Fleet. According to American sources and most Japanese accounts the phrase was broadcast in plain Japanese in the katakana naval syllabary. It read:

NIITAKA YAMA NOBORE, 1208.

In English:

CLIMB MOUNT NIITAKA, 1208 REPEAT 1208.⁴¹

At 1:30 A.M. on December 2, the message reached Hawaii. One of Kisner's operators at Station H, Joseph Christie Howard,⁴² intercepted the order. He had started his midnight watch and had been on intercept duty ninety minutes when he heard the familiar dot-dash of Japan's navy kana on his earphones. Like most of the bachelor radiocryptographers, Howard lived on the base of Station H in a large open-porch barracks and walked to the radio shack—the operations center. He transcribed the message on his code typewriter, entered it in the log book, and put it in the intelligence pipeline. But in the next step of the pipeline, deceit took over. According to Edwin Layton, Hawaii never received the NIITAKA transmission. He developed four different stories that implied that the message was never intercepted or received in Hawaii.⁴³

But the stories were flawed, for the message was intercepted by Joseph Howard at Station H. For 58 years Howard's account of intercepting Yamamoto's war start message never became public. Howard never testified before any Pearl Harbor investigation, including the Thurmond-Spence inquiry of 1995. During most of Layton's postwar lifetime, the Navy intercept records of Station H remained in locked vaults, classified TOP SECRET CODEWORD, unavailable to the public. Layton certainly had reason to believe that the intercepts would never be declassified and would never be used to contradict the assertions he made about the NIITAKA messages. Most of all no one could foresee that Joseph Howard would outlive Layton. But Edwin Layton died on April 12, 1984. And as this book goes to press in 1999, Howard is alive and well and living in Kent, Washington.⁴⁴

In truth, the message was intercepted by three Navy listening posts—on Corregidor, Guam, and Hawaii—and was available by December 3 Hawaii Time for delivery to Admiral Hart and General MacArthur in Manila, Admiral Kimmel and General Short in Hawaii, and President Roosevelt's military staff in Washington. But there is no record indicating that any of the officials saw the intercept. None of the Pearl Harbor investigations followed the paper trail of the NIITAKA dispatch that led from Stations CAST, HYPO, or BAKER on Guam.

Japanese naval historians are split on the broadcast details of the CLIMB NIITAKA message. Two authoritative Japanese historians say the message was transmitted in plain language, while Yamamoto's biographer, Hiroyuki Agawa, writes, "The message was encoded syllable by syllable using the five-digit, random numbers code."⁴⁵

President Carter first released an English-language version of the infamous intercept in 1979. The original American interception documents that provide the complete details of the text have not been declassified by the United States. The original Japanese intercept, obtained by Joseph Christie Howard, produced at least two official Navy documents on 8½ × 11 paper. The Navy has censored Howard and his original records. Though he was America's expert witness to the CLIMB NIITAKA message, he never testified before any Pearl Harbor investigation.⁴⁶

Beginning in 1988, the author filed FOIA requests with the Navy, the National Security Agency (NSA), and the National Archives asking to examine Howard's original documents.⁴⁷ Nothing was released. Instead, three officials supervised a ten-year blackout and denied the author access. From 1988 to 1997, FOIA appeals were made to NSA officials including Vice Admirals William Studemann, John McConnell, and the Navy's communications intelligence head, Rear Admiral Thomas Stevens. All replied with a firm No.

The last person believed to have seen the records was Homer Kisner, the traffic chief at Station H. Asked by the author whether he or Howard could translate the plain-language Japanese kana of the NIITAKA message, Kisner said he could not recall Howard's language skills because he had been aboard for only a few months. But the more senior personnel could read simple Japanese kana text. "All of us who had been in the organization since the mid-thirties knew the word yama meant mountain." Did he understand the message's significance? He said he could not recall but added, "The original intercept and working papers of the message would disclose my reaction." Did he believe the message was withheld from Admiral Kimmel? "I have no way of determining what happened to the message once I delivered it to HYPO. Our organization's primary purpose was to provide information to the admiral, not withhold."⁴⁸

Both versions of the NIITAKA message released by the United States (left) and Japan (right) are suspect. the US version asserts that Tokyo Radio, HA FU 6, transmitted the message on 4155 kilocycles and used Yamamoto's personal radio call sign YO WI 00. Japan's version appears to be a postwar reconstruction and contradicts Joseph Howard's version by claiming the frequency was 4175 kilocycles. Neither version clarifies whether the original transmission is in plain Japanese. Japanese translators at the University of California, Berkeley, could not find any radiocall signs listed in Japan's version.

Source: USA= SRN #115376 in RG #457, Archives II; Japan, Miyauchi p. 11.

Since none of the original documents were presented to the congressional investigations, no official determination has been made whether the message is in plain Japanese. If Japanese historians are correct, Yamamoto chose his phrase from the "hidden-word" code book devised by Japan's naval cryptographers, not the more sophisticated Code Book D, which used a five-number system to encode messages. The hidden-word code is from Code Book A, which contained scores of phrases with hidden meanings.

Words with hidden meanings might intrigue Japanese scholars but they are a disaster when used for communications intelligence. Even a relatively inexperienced communication intelligence specialist could discern their meaning—and did. When the English version of the message was prepared (but never introduced into evidence) for Congress in 1945, a cryptographer whose Navy initials are RK interpreted the meaning of NIITAKA YAMA NOBORE, 1208. RK wrote: “This was undoubtedly the prearranged signal for specifying the date for opening hostilities. However, the significance of the phrase is interesting in that it is so appropriately used in this connection. Niitaka Yama is the highest mountain in the Japanese Empire. To climb Niitaka Yama is to accomplish one of the greatest feats—in other words, undertake the task (for carrying out assigned operations). 1208 signifies the 12 month, 8th day, Item time.”⁴⁹

Howard used his Elliott-Underwood code typewriter to convert the Japanese naval kana dot-dash to message text. He spent about five minutes typing the short message, finished his shift about 8:00 A.M., and filed his logs and message sheets with watch supervisor Elliott Okins.⁵⁰

Howard intercepted at least eight Japanese naval messages, including the NIITAKA dispatch, during his shift. Two messages involved the aircraft carrier Kasuga Maru (a.k.a. HIMJS Taiyo), Carrier Division Four, and Air Flotilla Twenty-Two, the powerful land-based navy air force that sank Britain’s HMS Prince of Wales and HMS Repulse during the first week of hostilities. Okins analyzed Howard’s intercepts but did not include the CLIMB NIITAKA dispatch or those involving the Kasuga Maru and Carrier Division Four in his report to Kisner.⁵¹

After he received Okins’ analysis at about 8:30 A.M., Kisner prepared his Daily Chronology for December 2. He noted the Carrier Division Four report but failed to mention the Kasuga Maru and the remarkable CLIMB NIITAKA dispatch. Kisner then took the intercepts gathered by Howard and other radio operators to Rochefort’s office. His intelligence bundle contained radio direction finder and code movement reports of the Japanese fleet. About 1000 intercepts were in the bundle, representing reports from the previous twenty-four hours. Kisner believes that Rochefort would have spotted Yamamoto’s NIITAKA message and recognized the importance. “He was an expert Japanese translator and was assisted by four other language officers attached to HYPO,” Kisner told the author.

Rochefort and his staff distilled the bundle into the Daily Communication Intelligence Summary and delivered it to Admiral Kimmel for his scheduled 8:00 A.M. briefing by Edwin Layton on December 3. The Summary’s contents had nothing to say about the NIITAKA dispatch or Howard’s intercepts of the carrier Kasuga Maru and Carrier Division Four, whose mission was to attack American bases in the Philippines. Under the heading “CARRIERS,” Rochefort wrote, “Almost a complete blank of information on the Carriers today. Lack of identification has somewhat promoted this lack of information. However, since over two hundred service calls have been partially identified since the change on the first of December and not one carrier call is at a low ebb.”⁵²

Admiral Thomas Hart, the Asiatic Fleet commander, saw decoded and translated copies of most intercepts produced at Station CAST. On orders from Washington, Hart normally shared them with General MacArthur.⁵³ Circumstances suggest that Hart learned of the message—for speedy military action in the Philippines followed soon after NIITAKA hit the air-waves. Hart cleared all his warships from Manila Bay on December 3 (Manila Time) and sent them south to Dutch naval bases. MacArthur ordered his construction engineers to enlarge an airstrip used by the Del Monte pineapple plantation on Mindanao Island in the southern Philippines for use by B-17 bombers.⁵⁴

The evidence available today is plentiful, but circumstantial. Until the Navy comes clean, the true fate of the NIITAKA message will remain a mystery.

Captain Charles Horatio McMorris, Kimmel’s war plans officer, assured the admiral that there wasn’t a chance of a Japanese air raid on Pearl Harbor: “The admiral asked me when I thought there would be an attack on Pearl Harbor by air and I said, Never.”⁵⁵

Was Kimmel convinced by McMorris’ answer? On December 5, he had McMorris draw up a secret action plan for the fleet in case war broke out within the next forty-eight hours. McMorris prepared twelve war-action recommendations that essentially kept the fleet’s aircraft carriers, Enterprise and Lexington, together with their escorts of six cruisers and thirteen destroyers, out of Pearl Harbor. The third carrier, Saratoga, was held on the West Coast of California. Then, after approving the weekend waraction plan, Kimmel returned to a peacetime routine. He accepted a Saturday-night invitation to a luau at the Halekulani Hotel on Waikiki beach and scheduled a round of golf with General Short for Sunday morning, December 7.

THIS MEANS WAR

CBS RADIO BUREAU
SINGAPORE
DECEMBER 6, 1941, HAWAII TIME

ADAMIRAL HUSBAND KIMMEL MIGHT NOT HAVE GONE TO THE LUAU AND might have canceled his golf game if he had heard Cecil Brown's radio broadcast from Singapore: "The British military is prepared for a Japanese surprise move over the weekend. Soldiers and sailors have been recalled to their barracks and ships." Brown reported that American reconnaissance planes had sighted a strong force of Japanese warships and troop transports heading for invasion beaches in central Malaya.¹

But despite the many indications of an attack that had been received over the airwaves, Kimmel wasn't looking for carriers or anticipating a surprise move by Japan. Though he had seven aircraft in the air on local patrol, fifty-four of his long-range PBV scout planes were grounded.²

The paradox of the White House ordering Kimmel to stand aside, all the while denying him full access to Japanese communications intelligence, is further illustrated by another cryptographic channel that revealed Japanese war moves. Japan's military wasn't the only organization divulging secrets. On December 5, Japanese Foreign Ministry officials transmitted two messages which disclosed that war between Japan and America would start December 7. Stations US, CAST, and FIVE obtained two intercepts. They were in the Purple Code; interception of the messages went fine, but there's no evidence that Stations US and CAST forwarded the intercepts to Hawaii—even though both cryptographic centers knew the keys to Purple and decoded such messages in hours.

Neither message was decoded until after the attack. This was true of every Japanese military and diplomatic message obtained during the week of December 1–6, which stated that Hawaii was the target of a carrier attack, set the date for the war's start, or named the enemy as Britain and America.

The American policy of noninterference with Japan's first overt act of war can be further documented through four diplomatic intercepts that were obtained December 6 and 7, before the Pearl Harbor raid, and that reveal the speedy decryption service provided to President Roosevelt. Japan transmitted the messages in four parts over a twenty-four-hour period—a time frame that permitted American cryptographers ample opportunity for rapid decoding and translation. First Tokyo sent a "pilot" message, known as Part 1, to Ambassador Kichisaburo Nomura in Washington, which said that Japan would reply to nearly one year of diplomatic negotiations with America. The reply was arranged in two messages. Tokyo outlined the subject of both, saying Part 2 would contain thirteen parts and Part 3 would contain the final fourteenth part. Nomura was told that Part 4 would be dispatched last and would set the time of presentation of the reply to the United States.

[Secret]

From: Tokyo
To: Bangkok
December 6, 1941
Purple (Urgent)
(CA)
#852.

The (——)* day (X Day) decided by the ——^b liaison conference on the 6th (?)^c is the 8th and the day on which the notice is to be given is the 7th (?) (Sunday). As soon as you have received this message, please reply to that effect.

Army 25881 Trans. 12/8/41 NR)

Translator's assumptions:
* "Proclamation" or "declaration."
^b "Ambassadorial" or "China."
^c This word is garbled and could be either the word "6th" or the word "November."

This is the Station CAST intercept that assigns a date to “X Day.” It is the first of two Japanese Foreign Ministry messages in Purple Code dated December 5, 1941, Tokyo Time.

According to the intercept shown above, Foreign Minister Togo notified his Bangkok ambassador that “X Day” would be December 8 Tokyo Time. His message, sent in the Purple Code, was intercepted at Station CAST, but neither the C designator nor the time of interception was included in this document, presented to the Joint Congressional Investigating Committee in 1945–46. Cryptographers at CAST said they could decode Purple messages in one day or less but “trans” took two days, according to the notation above.³

[Secret]

From: Peking
To: Tokyo
5 December 1941
(Purple)
Cir #625—(Circular Number) To be handled in government code.
Re my secret military communication #262* of November 30th.
1. Concurrent with opening war on Britain and America we have considered Holland as a semi-belligerent and have exercised strict surveillance over her consulates and prohibited all communication between them and the enemy countries.
2. Coincident with the beginning of the war against Britain and America we have taken steps to prohibit the use of code messages and the use of wireless by the Holland consulates.
3. In case war breaks out with Holland we will take the same steps toward that country that we have taken in the case of Britain and America.
26108
JD-1: 7335
*Not available.

(H) Navy Trans. 12-11-41 (AR)

Source: PHPT 12, p. 236.

The beginning of the war on Britain and America is plainly stated in this Purple message sent from Japan’s minister in Peking to Tokyo. General Short’s interception unit at Fort Shafter, Station FIVE, obtained this all-telling message on December 4, Hawaii Time. Congress was not told that this message was intercepted in Hawaii; neither was Short. The designator 5 has been omitted and AR [Army Radio] substituted. There is no explanation for why it took eight days for a “Navy trans.” Both Army and Navy cryptographers commonly produced decodes of Purple Code intercepts for FDR within hours.

Unknown to Japan, US Army and Navy cryptographers intercepted, decoded, and translated the four messages before they reached Ambassador Nomura. In essence, the four intercepts directed the ambassador to present a fourteen-part memorandum that severed Japanese relations with the United States government and set a presentation deadline of 1:00 P.M. EST for Sunday, December 7. Though the deadline message lacked specificity, Washington’s senior military leaders realized that 1:00 P.M. corresponded to 7:30 A.M. in Hawaii and that some hostile action by Japan could occur then or shortly thereafter.

All four intercepted cablegrams were decoded, translated, and delivered promptly to President Roosevelt over a twelve-hour period starting at 9:30 P.M. Saturday, December 6, and ending at 10:00 A.M. December 7. But for reasons that are difficult to accept, direct delivery of the messages to Army Chief of Staff General George Marshall was delayed for fifteen hours. During the 1945–46 Pearl Harbor investigation, Republicans would wonder aloud: was the delay deliberate, to forestall American military interference with Japan’s attack?

Instead of picking up his scrambler telephone and tipping off General Short to the 1:00 P.M. deadline, Marshall sent the warning to Hawaii using a combination of Western Union and RCA, a slower method.⁴ A bizarre paper trail follows the four intercepts from Tokyo to the Oval Study in the White House. It includes a later attempt to distance Pearl Harbor investigators from Marshall and the 1:00 P.M. deadline and involves coercion of a US Army colonel to alter his testimony. It even reaches to post-surrender Germany in 1945 when that colonel, Rufus Bratton, was flagged down on the Berlin Autobahn and persuaded to “modify” evidence against Marshall.

The first of Foreign Minister Togo’s four orders, which preceded the 14-part message breaking off relations and declaring war, is known as the “pilot” message. It laid out Japan’s plans for war notification. On December 5, Togo demanded that secrecy be maintained and messaged Nomura to be on the lookout for a fourteen-part memorandum that would be sent “tomorrow” (December 6, EST). Togo said that the last part of the message—the time of delivery to the Americans—would be sent later. In the meantime, Nomura was to prepare the memorandum “in nicely drafted form and make every preparation to present it to the Americans just as soon as you receive instructions.”⁵

By 3:00 P.M. December 6 (EST), the first thirteen parts of Togo’s war scenario notification were intercepted at Station SAIL and sent to Station US by teleprinter for decoding. Commander Laurance Safford, head of Station US, supervised the decryption and, to speed up decoding, sent six parts of the memo to the Army's cryptographic section in the adjoining Munitions Building. By about 4:00 P.M., with the Army's help, all thirteen parts had been converted to English except for minor garbles. Upon reading all thirteen parts, Safford knew war was coming; he notified the White House. He asked FDR's naval aide, Captain Beardall, to alert the President to expect delivery of very important intelligence that evening. Safford then worked out a delivery schedule with his principal Japanese translator and thirty-eight-year-old aide, Lieutenant Commander Alwin Kramer. The schedule called for delivery of the message to the White House and separate copies to go to Secretary of the Navy Frank Knox and other top naval officers. Kramer then took extraordinary steps to get the intercept to Roosevelt. He telephoned his wife at home and explained the emergency. She agreed to act as chauffeur and drive her courier husband on his delivery rounds. Mrs. Kramer pulled up to the gates of the White House at 9:00 P.M. Her husband jumped out, passed through the Secret Service checkpoint, and raced to the small basement office of the naval aide. Here he found Lieutenant Lester Schulz, who had been alerted to the delivery by Beardall.⁶

Schulz phoned the White House ushers' office and was told to come over, the President is expecting you. By 9:30 P.M. he was ushered into Roosevelt's Oval Study in the second-floor residential quarters. Schulz quickly opened the leather pouch and handed the secret documents to the commander-in-chief, pointing out that the set of messages was incomplete. Two more messages were expected from Japan: Part Fourteen and a delivery deadline. Schulz recognized Harry Hopkins, FDR's confidant and former secretary of commerce, pacing back and forth in the room.

The President spent about ten minutes reading all thirteen parts, according to Schulz's testimony before the Joint Congressional Investigations Committee. The long message conveying Japan's official reasons for making war charged America with obstructionist tactics aimed at Japan's economy and favoring the side of Chiang Kai-shek in the China War, and it alleged that the American government wanted to extend the war:

THE JAPANESE GOVERNMENT CANNOT TOLERATE THE PERPETUATION OF SUCH A SITUATION SINCE IT DIRECTLY RUNS COUNTER TO JAPAN'S FUNDAMENTAL POLICY TO ENABLE ALL NATIONS TO EACH ENJOY ITS PROPER PLACE IN THE WORLD.⁷

Schulz remembered that FDR finished the last page of the memorandum, turned to Hopkins, and pronounced the famous utterance: "This means war." It was 9:45 P.M. Neither the President nor Hopkins discussed Pearl Harbor as the Japanese target, nor did they mention any date for the war's start. While he waited in the study, Schulz overheard Hopkins express the view that since war was going to come at the convenience of the Japanese, it was too bad we couldn't strike the first blow to prevent our being surprised. "The President nodded and then said, in effect, 'No, we can't do that. We are a democracy and a peaceful people.' Then he raised his voice, and this much I remember definitely. He said, 'But we have a good record.'"⁸

Schulz said that FDR then picked up the telephone and tried to reach Admiral Stark. Told that the admiral was attending a performance of the Sigmund Romberg operetta The Student Prince at the National Theater, Roosevelt decided to wait. "He did not want to cause public concern by having the admiral paged inside the theater, for if he left suddenly it would have been seen by the audience and cause undue alarm," Schulz testified. Stark's hasty departure would have been reported by news media and could have tipped off Tokyo that America anticipated hostile action.

At about 10:00 P.M., FDR handed the documents back to Schulz, who then returned to his small office and gave them to the waiting Kramer. For the next three hours, the Kramers traveled about the District of Columbia and the Virginia suburbs of Alexandria and Arlington showing the top brass the memorandum that Roosevelt had called a declaration of war. Except for the Kramers and President Roosevelt, Washington's senior military brass were all involved in social activities on Saturday night, December 6. Admiral Stark, the Navy's operational boss, was at the theater and Secretary of the Navy Knox was entertaining officials of the Chicago Daily News in his Wardman Park Hotel suite. The Kramers found Captain Theodore Wilkinson, Director of Naval Intelligence, hosting a gathering in his Arlington, Virginia, residence that included Captain John Beardall and Brigadier General Sherman Miles, head of Army Intelligence. After showing the Japanese memorandum to a select few of Wilkinson's military guests, Kramer returned to Station US and placed the secret document in its safe. Lieutenant Commander Watts, the duty officer, told Kramer that the two crucial elements of the memorandum, the fourteenth part and the deadline instructions, had not yet been intercepted. Kramer then left for his home, assuring Watts he would return at 7:30 in the morning when Commander Arthur McCollum took over as duty officer.⁹

A few hours later, a highly unusual Japanese communication procedure caught the eye of intercept operators at Station SAIL. Just before midnight, Pacific Standard Time, Radio Tokyo, using Morse code, contacted RCA Wireless and Mackay Radio & Telegraph in San Francisco. The contact was in plain English and alerted both firms to expect two very important messages addressed to KOSHI (Ambassador) in Washington. Transmitting messages over the dual facilities was a rare procedure for Radio Tokyo and served as a special alarm to the intercept operators at SAIL. At five minutes past midnight, the Tokyo-San Francisco circuit sprang to life with the arrival of the delayed fourteenth part of Togo's memorandum. Then at 1:37 A.M. the final part of the message—the deadline—arrived. SAIL operators instantly intercepted the messages and verified that "VERY IMPORTANT"—in English—prefaced each. By 2:00 A.M. both messages were entered on the SAIL logs as intercepts 380 and 381 and sent by teleprinter to Station US in the nation's capital.

The time was about 5:00 A.M. in Washington and 11:30 P.M. Saturday night in Hawaii when watch officer Lieutenant Francis M. Brotherhood pulled the two messages off the printer. Brotherhood was part of the Navy's cryptographic team that had solved Japan's main Navy code, the 5-Num system. He was also adept at decoding the Purple machine's diplomatic code. He noted that both intercepts were in the Purple system. When he ran it through the machine, 380 turned out in English. "It was perfectly clear to me," Brotherhood said. "It was the missing part fourteen and I readied it for dissemination through the customary channels."

OBVIOUSLY IT IS THE INTENTION OF THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT TO CONSPIRE WITH GREAT BRITAIN AND OTHER COUNTRIES TO OBSTRUCT JAPAN'S EFFORTS TOWARD THE ESTABLISHMENT OF PEACE THROUGH THE CREATION OF A NEW ORDER IN EAST ASIA, AND ESPECIALLY TO PRESERVE ANGLO AMERICAN RIGHTS AND INTERESTS BY KEEPING JAPAN AND CHINA AT WAR. THIS INTENTION HAS BEEN REVEALED CLEARLY DURING THE COURSE OF THE PRESENT NEGOTIATIONS. THUS, THE EARNEST HOPE OF THE JAPANESE GOVERNMENT TO ADJUST JAPANESE-AMERICAN RELATIONS AND TO PRESERVE AND PROMOTE PEACE OF THE PACIFIC THROUGH COOPERATION WITH THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT HAS FINALLY BEEN LOST.

THE JAPANESE GOVERNMENT REGRETS TO HAVE TO NOTIFY HEREBY THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT THAT IN VIEW OF THE ATTITUDE OF THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT IT CANNOT BUT CONSIDER THAT IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO REACH AN AGREEMENT THROUGH FURTHER NEGOTIATIONS.

Message 381 was in Japanese, so Brotherhood, who was not a translator, walked the intercept to the nearby Munitions Building, where Army translators were on duty. It was the deadline message:

VERY IMPORTANT. WILL THE AMBASSADOR PLEASE SUBMIT TO THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT (IF POSSIBLE THE SECRETARY OF STATE) OUR REPLY TO THE UNITED STATES AT 1:00 P.M. ON THE 7TH YOUR TIME.¹⁰

It was nearly seven o'clock in the morning and the end of Brotherhood's shift. Before going off duty, he placed the decoded and translated SAIL messages on the desk of Alwin Kramer, who Brotherhood knew was expected in at about 7:30 A.M. Now it was up to the "runner," Kramer, to get both messages into the hands of Roosevelt and his top military and diplomatic advisors. Kramer reported to his office at 7:30 promptly, picked up the two SAIL messages, and realized their import: Japan planned to end diplomatic relations with the United States and directed that the rupture notice be delivered at 1:00 P.M. local time, which was 7:30 A.M. in Hawaii. Kramer discussed the two intercepts with Commander Arthur McCollum, who had just arrived. Both realized the significance of the 7:30 A.M. time in the Pacific, but neither had authority to transmit any warnings. Only Stark or Marshall could issue war warnings. The time was now about 8:00 A.M. in Washington and 2:30 A.M. in Hawaii. After assuring himself that Army intelligence officials were aware of the 1:00 P.M. deadline, Lieutenant Commander Kramer set off to deliver both messages to the White House while McCollum took copies of the messages to Admiral Stark. The time was now about 9:30 A.M. EST. In Hawaiian waters, Japan's First Air Fleet was speeding along the 157 degree meridian of longitude and nearing the Prokofiev Seamount. In two hours the carriers were scheduled to launch their first bombers.

The paper trail of the deadline message is fully documented in Navy files. It was intercepted in the early morning hours of Sunday and delivered to the White House by Commander Kramer at 10:00 A.M.—4:30 A.M. in Pearl Harbor. Instead of relying on his wife as chauffeur, Kramer ran the four blocks to the White House. There Captain Beardall, the naval aide, handed the message to Roosevelt in his bedroom. According to Beardall, the President read the intercept but made no comment on the 1:00 P.M. deadline. "I had no sense that he was alarmed," Beardall said.¹¹

Even though the night before FDR had said that the earlier Japanese intercept "meant war," Navy officials in Washington continued to delay sending war warnings to the Pacific. After the curtain came down on The Student Prince, Stark returned home and about midnight discussed the memorandum with Roosevelt by telephone. According to Stark's account, Roosevelt stated that "our affairs with Japan were in a very critical condition" but did not suggest any action be taken. Stark went to sleep.¹²

Tracing the Army's delivery of the identical set of Foreign Minister Togo's intercepts during the weekend is labyrinthine. Evasive accounts from some of the Army's top generals of World War II contribute to the complexity. The trail is obscured by charges of intimidation, perjured testimony, coercion of witnesses, and obstruction of justice. Two of the most famous and respected American generals of World War II—General George C. Marshall and Lieutenant General Walter Bedell Smith—are involved. Controversy reached into the congressional investigation of 1945–46 when two congressmen verbally battled over whether or not changes in Army testimony involving the 1:00 P.M. message were coerced by "small-town police court tactics."

These charges and countercharges focused on the Army's "runner," Colonel Rufus Bratton, and whether he delivered Togo's four intercepted messages to General Marshall in a timely manner. Bratton's duties paralleled those of Kramer. He worked for Army Intelligence and distributed the secret intelligence reports to a select list that included Secretary of State Cordell Hull and Marshall. Bratton never delivered intelligence messages to the White House; that was a Navy responsibility, by presidential edict.

Bratton said he obtained the first two messages—the pilot and the first thirteen parts—from Kramer at about 4:00 P.M. Saturday. He read and recognized their importance and placed them in two locked leather pouches, one for Marshall and the other for Secretary of State Hull. Then he began delivery, leaving the pouch intended for Marshall with the Secretary of the Army's General Staff, Colonel Walter Bedell Smith, who promised immediate delivery to the general's residence in Fort Myer, Virginia, about a ten-minute drive from the War Department. Between 9:00 and 10:00 P.M., Colonel Bratton reached the State Department and delivered the pouch to Hull's office, then went off duty.

The delivery intended for General Marshall was delayed fifteen hours and did not reach him until about 11:00 A.M. EST on December 7, when it appeared on his desk in the War Department. Japan's 1:00 P.M. deadline message was turned over to Bratton on Sunday morning around 9:00 A.M. Bratton, like his Navy counterpart, realized the significance of the time-frame and frantically tried to reach Marshall at his home. Told the general was out riding horseback, Bratton asked that an orderly be sent out to the bridle paths of Fort Myer to locate the Army chief and advise him of the emergency. More delay ensued. Finally, at about 10:00 A.M., Marshall returned Bratton's phone calls and learned of the emergency. Bratton offered to come immediately to Fort Myer. Marshall declined the offer and said he would drive directly to his office—a ten-minute drive.

Marshall didn't arrive in his office, however, until about 11:15, a 75-minute delay. The thirteen-part message was on the top of his desk. Marshall spent 30 minutes with it. Bratton repeatedly tried to interrupt Marshall and show him the 1:00 P.M. deadline message but was rebuffed. But by 11:45, Marshall apparently realized its significance, and wrote out a warning to the Army's Pacific commanders. He checked by telephone with Stark, who asked that naval commanders also be notified and offered the use of the powerful Navy radio stations to broadcast the message to the Pacific. Marshall declined the offer and sent this message to four Army commands:

JAPANESE ARE PRESENTING AT ONE P.M. EASTERN STANDARD TIME TODAY WHAT AMOUNTS TO AN ULTIMATUM ALSO THEY ARE UNDER ORDERS TO DESTROY THEIR CODE MACHINE IMMEDIATELY STOP JUST WHAT SIGNIFICANCE THE HOUR SET MAY HAVE WE DO NOT KNOW BUT BE ON ALERT ACCORDINGLY STOP INFORM NAVAL AUTHORITIES OF THIS COMMUNICATION. /SS/ MARSHALL

At 11:52 A.M. in Washington and 6:22 A.M. in Hawaii, the Army's radio station WAR began transmitting Marshall's handwritten alert to the Caribbean Defense Command in Panama, General MacArthur in Manila, and the Western Defense Command in San Francisco. Last on the list was Hawaii, where at 12:17 P.M. [EST] WAR tried to contact General Short's command at Fort Shafter. The radio signals failed to reach from Washington to Hawaii, so the message to Short was sent via the Western Union land lines between Washington and San Francisco, then by RCA radio to Honolulu. The transmission delay has never been adequately explained. Just twelve minutes earlier, at 12:05 P.M., WAR had successfully relayed Marshall's alert to MacArthur in Manila through the Fort Shafter radio.

According to Bratton's testimony, he spent nearly three hours, from 9:00 to 11:45 on Sunday morning, December 7, attempting to convince Marshall to act on the emergency. This delay was investigated in 1944 by the principal Army inquiry into the Pearl Harbor disaster. Three Army generals determined that the delay began on Saturday night, December 6, and ended at eleven o'clock the next morning, a time lag of fifteen hours.¹³

Their investigation, authorized by Congress and called the Army Pearl Harbor Board, coincided with the fall 1944 presidential contest between Roosevelt and Thomas Dewey. After concluding their three-month investigation on October 6, 1944, the three generals issued a report that damaged the reputation of General Marshall. One finding concluded that Marshall failed in his communications with Short over the weekend of December 6–7. They found that “[Marshall failed] to get to General Short on the evening of December 6 and the early morning of December 7, the critical information indicating an almost immediate break with Japan, though there was ample time to have accomplished this.”¹⁴

Marshall quickly sought to counter the charge and, with the approval of Henry Stimson, Secretary of War, dispatched an Army major on a 55,000-mile aerial journey throughout the European and Pacific war theaters to gather affidavits and testimony that contradicted Bratton's account. Hostilities were still raging over the entire globe, as Major [Later Lieutenant Colonel] Henry Clausen began the sixth Pearl Harbor investigation in March 1945.

Clausen, an Army reservist and a lawyer in civilian life, obtained affidavits from ten Army officers during 1945 who disputed Bratton's account of the evening of December 6, but with the caveat, “to the best of my memory.” Most important was the sworn affidavit given by Lieutenant General Walter Bedell Smith, by then chief of staff to General Dwight Eisenhower. Smith confirmed that Bratton brought intercepts to him in a locked pouch on various occasions in the fall of 1941, but did not recall seeing him on the night of December 6. “To the best of my recollection, I left the office at around seven P.M. that night.” Neither Smith nor the other nine officers actually denied Bratton's assertion that he dropped off the thirteen-part message for delivery to Marshall's residence at Smith's office that evening. Their affidavits contain the numerous qualifications easily recognized in military circles as passing the buck.¹⁵

In what might be the most bizarre episode in the Pearl Harbor raid's story, Henry Clausen confronted Rufus Bratton with the ten affidavits. Clausen traveled to Berlin after the German surrender, tailed Bratton's automobile, and flagged it to the shoulder of the Autobahn. As military vehicular traffic whizzed by, Clausen persuaded Bratton to "modify" his recollection concerning his intended delivery to General Marshall on December 6, 1941. Both then flew to the Hotel Prince of Wales in Paris, where the text of the modification was drawn up. Bratton then "made some statement to Colonel Clausen to the effect that in light of the evidence before me now it seems advisable for me to modify some of the statements that I gave before the Grunert Board" [the Army Pearl Harbor Board].

But despite Clausen's efforts, Bratton never changed his original testimony. The Army Board's assignment of failure to General Marshall stood. During the congressional investigation of 1945–46, Republicans and Democrats verbally clashed over whether Bratton's affidavit was coerced under pressure from America's top generals. Republican Congressman Frank Keefe of Wisconsin, in a quarrel with Democrat John Murphy of Pennsylvania, complained that "There have been so many changes of testimony relative to this matter, produced by the Clausen report, and testimony under oath in the Army and Navy reports and so on that I am having difficulty finding out what the fact is."¹⁶

Even after the countless American missteps in the early morning hours of December 7, there was still an opportunity to alert the American fleet to the raid. Between 6:50 A.M. and 7:15 A.M. Hawaii Time two Army radar operators detected the first wave of Japanese aircraft closing in on Oahu. Two large blips appeared on their radar screen during that twenty-five-minute period. As the blips became progressively larger, indicating an approach to Oahu, the operators became concerned and telephoned warnings to the Army's Aircraft Warning Service (AWS) at Fort Shafter. Neither operator identified the mass of aircraft as either friendly or hostile, just that "it was the largest group of planes I ever saw on the oscilloscope."

Privates Joseph Lockard and George Elliott focused the electronic beam of the radar's set directly north along the 157th meridian of longitude. They were part of an Army signal battalion that operated several radar sites in Hawaii.¹⁷ Both privates were in their early twenties, had had at least four months of training in radar operations, and were considered experienced in this still-new technology. As they stared at the radarscope, images appeared indicating that large groups of aircraft were heading toward their vantage point on 700-foot Opana Hill, on Oahu's north shore near Kahuku Point. Both privates checked their instruments and antennae to be sure the radar beam was not reporting a flight of birds or false echoes off the water. Certain that their evaluation was correct, Elliott used a direct telephone link to the AWS center and reported the bearings. No interest was shown by the duty officer, Lieutenant Kermit Tyler, an Army fighter pilot who was learning basic intercept operations. It was his first day on the radar post and he knew nothing about AWS skills. Tyler told Elliott to "forget it." As the planes continued to move from 130 miles out and closed in on Oahu, Lockard got on the phone again, but he could only reach the switchboard operator, Private Joseph McDonald. McDonald was as experienced in radar technology as Elliott and Lockard, even though the Army only gave him a lowly private's rating. The threesome knew far more about radar operations than the very inexperienced Tyler. McDonald had been working at the AWS center since August, first installing the radar-plotting equipment, then manning the telephone switchboard. Like the other trained enlisted personnel, McDonald worked every day, including weekends.

Lockard pleaded to be connected with Tyler. He told McDonald, "It's the first time I have ever received anything like this. It's an awfully big flight. Large number of planes coming in from the north, three points east. I am really excited." Twice McDonald tried to get Tyler to answer the phone: "Sir, I would appreciate it very much if you would answer the phone."¹⁸

Tyler gave in about 7:20 A.M., and talked with Lockard, but dismissed his radar report as "nothing." In testimony he gave to the prime Army investigation of Pearl Harbor, McDonald said he had wanted to send a message to General Short and had showed it to Tyler. But the inexperienced Tyler would not allow the message to be sent; he closed down the center and released the radar crews for breakfast. Tyler believed the planes to be Army B-17 bombers en route to Hawaii from California. Earlier, as he drove to the AWS center for his four-to-eight-o'clock shift, Tyler had heard traditional Hawaiian music on his car radio. He offered the less-than-compelling explanation that a bomber pilot friend had told him that whenever Hawaiian music was played on the radio during the early morning hours it meant that flights of bombers were due to arrive from the mainland. Tyler said he thought the pilots used the music as a directional guide to Hawaii.¹⁹

Lieutenant General Short had acted on the November 27 orders from Washington directing that he establish reconnaissance operations and had directed that the Army radar detection search start two hours before sunrise and continue until 11:00 A.M. daily. He specifically stated that the operation was to include Sundays and holidays. He added an order that "all radar reports of aircraft involved with carriers come directly to me and keep the Commanding General and all interested staff officers informed regarding the enemy situation."²⁰

Five Army radar stations were placed in operation by the order, three on Oahu and two on Kauai. All five aimed their radar beams toward the North Pacific. General Short said his staff decided that the most dangerous time for hostile action was the two hours before dawn.²¹ Thirty men, headed by an Army major and assisted by a Navy and an Air Corps officer, were detailed to the control center during the danger period. Then for the remainder of the morning a training schedule went into effect.

When Tyler arrived at the center at 4:00 A.M. he found seven or eight enlisted men whose job entailed plotting radar reports on a large map of the Hawaiian Islands. There was no Army major to be seen. None of the promised Army, Navy, or Air Corps controllers were there either. Tyler was the only officer present.²² None of the others showed up until after the attack was in progress. Later, the commanding officer of the radar unit, Major Kenneth Berquist, testified that he was “not alert” that morning and not on duty at the time of the attack.²³ He never faced disciplinary action by Short. According to Tyler, there was no radar activity reported to him until about 6:10 A.M. when a radar station on Kauai reported several aircraft flying around Oahu (probably the scout planes from the Tone and the Chikuma). Radar was still in its infancy and there was no way to distinguish enemy from friendly aircraft. Tyler assumed that all radar reports were friendly and took no action. Besides, he didn’t know whom to call in an emergency.

When he heard the full details of the Opana Hill radar site debacle in 1944, Lieutenant General George Grunert, president of the Army’s Pearl Harbor investigating board, said the entire organization was faulty, its instruction faulty, and lacked common sense and reasoning. “There was nobody to do the work,” Grunert said. “The Navy liaison man wasn’t there, then at seven A.M. everybody disappeared except the telephone operator.” Grunert summed up the Opana situation: “It seems all cock-eyed to me—and that, on the record.”²⁴

The confusion in the air was mirrored by pandemonium on the water. During the early morning hours of December 7, crewmen of a minesweeper, USS Condor, sighted the periscope and conning tower of a Japanese submarine about one and three quarters miles off the Pearl Harbor entrance. At 3:42 A.M., a fluorescent wake near the Condor’s port bow caught the attention of Ensign Russell McCloy. He focused his binoculars on the wake and discovered that it was caused by a periscope that was moving at about nine knots and stirring the waters to a brilliant glow. On closer examination, McCloy detected a conning tower of a partially submerged submarine. Two crewmen standing watch alongside him confirmed the sighting and realized it was not a US sub; they were forbidden to be submerged in the entrance channel and adjacent waters, which were in a Defensive Sea Area, a ten-square-mile zone where submerged vessels were prohibited. Admiral Kimmel had previously issued standing orders directing Navy vessels to attack submerged vessels in the zone.

When sighted, the sub was proceeding toward the Pearl Harbor entrance and was on a collision course with the Condor. Apparently it sighted the minesweeper and turned sharply to port. McCloy then sent a visual blinker light message to a destroyer, the USS Ward, patrolling the Defensive Zone: “Sighted submerged submarine on westerly course, speed nine knots.” After receiving the visual signal, the Ward made a sonar search for about an hour and a half, without result. Meanwhile the Condor returned inside the Pearl Harbor anchorage after an antisubmarine net that stretched across the entrance was retracted. The entry remained opened, for another Navy vessel—the USS Antares, with a 500-ton steel barge in tow—as expected at about 6:00 A.M.²⁵

During this period at least two Japanese midget submarines passed through the opened entrance and entered the Pacific Fleet’s anchorage. They were part of a force of five midget submarines transported from Japan while strapped to the top decks of mother subs. Between 2:00 and 3:00 A.M. the mother subs took positions about ten miles west of the entrance channel and released the five midgets. According to Admiral Yamamoto’s plan, the midgets were supposed to submerge and slip into the harbor prior to the carrier attack and contribute to the destruction of the Pacific Fleet.

When the Ward’s search proved fruitless, her captain, Lieutenant Commander William Outerbridge, contacted the Condor by radio for additional location data. In response, McCloy advised that the sub had been sighted in the channel. Their radio conversations took place over a fifteen-minute period and were conducted in plain language so that other warships and fleet command posts would be instantly alerted to submarine contacts. They followed orders issued by Admiral Kimmel a month earlier: “When American warships definitely know an enemy submarine is in the area then they are to broadcast the information in plain language in order to sound the alarm and alert the proper people and put them in a state of readiness.” A twenty-four-hour communication watch was established and a special radio frequency was set aside so every Pacific Fleet unit could monitor submarine alerts.²⁶

The fifteen-minute radio exchange between the Condor and the Ward did reach the Communication Watch Office of the Fourteenth Naval District. But the watch officer, Lieutenant Oliver Underkofler, was asleep and did not hear the loudspeaker report of the sub sighting.²⁷

At 6:30 A.M. the Antares, a large supply vessel with a barge in tow, entered the channel, spotted a small submarine about 1500 yards off its starboard side, and asked the Ward to investigate. The Ward complied, and at 6:40 A.M. sighted a partially submerged submarine following the Antares into Pearl Harbor. A shouted call from the officer of the deck, “Captain, come up on deck!” reawakened Outerbridge, who had retired to his cabin after the Condor’s alert proved elusive. Outerbridge took one look at the object following the Antares, sounded general quarters, and at 6:45 opened fire on the sub, hitting its conning tower. Four depth charges dropped by the Ward finished off the sub, which sank in 1200 feet of water. Just to be sure, a PBY search plane, also guarding the Defensive Zone, dropped two more charges on the spot. Outerbridge saw black fuel oil bubbling up on the water's surface. The first overt act by Japan, envisioned by McCollum in October 1940, had now taken place. The Empire had lost its first ship of war and two crew members to American defensive action.²⁸

Outerbridge radioed an alert in plain language over the special frequency: "We have dropped depth charges upon subs operating in Defensive Sea Area." Believing his first message wasn't strong enough, he sent another: "We have attacked, fired upon, and dropped depth charges upon submarine operating in Defensive Sea Area." These plain-language messages woke up Underkofler, who rushed the Ward's report to the senior duty officer for the Fourteenth Naval District, Lieutenant Commander Harold Kaminski. Now it was up to Kaminski to inform Rear Admiral Claude Bloch, the commandant of the Fourteenth District and the naval officer charged with protecting the fleet while at anchor in Hawaii. Kaminski received a busy signal when he dialed Bloch's aide. He then called Admiral Kimmel's office at the Submarine Base—a mile away—and reached the assistant duty officer, Lieutenant Commander F. L. Black.²⁹

Kaminski did not, however, inform General Short, though there was an Army teleprinter connected to Fort Shafter for just such a purpose. Later, Kaminski said he didn't have time. The time was now 7:15 A.M. It was thirty-seven minutes before the first Japanese bomb would be dropped on American soil.

Black took the Ward's report to Commander Vincent Murphy, the fleet duty officer, who had just awakened and was dressing. Acting with dispatch, Murphy telephoned Admiral Kimmel at his nearby residence and told him of the attack on the sub. "I'll be right down," Kimmel replied. The time was 7:35 A.M. Hawaii Time. Murphy's regular job was assistant war plans officer for Kimmel and he rotated the weekend duty officer position with other command officers.³⁰

It is perhaps ironic that of all the commissioned naval officers in the United States, Vincent Murphy should end up being the decision maker for the Pacific Fleet, until Kimmel's arrival. Navy documents show that Murphy had accompanied Admiral Richardson to Washington during the week of October 7–12, 1940, when the admiral held the tumultuous meeting with Roosevelt, and also attended dinner conferences that week with senior naval officials including Chief of Naval Operations Harold Stark. Murphy had even been present at the naval conferences on American Pacific policy in November 1940. Murphy, in other words, was aware of the strategy to provoke an attack.

Chance had thrust Murphy into a decisive role at Zero Hour. Predictably, he would do little to upset the Washington policy that called for Japan to fire the first shot. Regardless, it was almost too late. By 8:00 A.M., the attack was in full force.

THE ESCAPE WAS NORTH

ADAMIRAL KIMMEL'S GOLF GAME WITH GENERAL SHORT ON SUNDAY, December 7, 1941, was set for 9:30 in the morning on the nine-hole Army course at Fort Shafter.¹ But the relaxation promised by the vistas of fairways and tees vanished with the 7:45 A.M. phone call from Commander Vincent Murphy, reporting the discovery of an enemy submarine in the Pearl Harbor entry channel. As Kimmel was preparing to leave his quarters bombs began to fall on his warships. The USS Arizona exploded in a giant fireball.² Kimmel witnessed the terrible destruction from the lanai of his home while he awaited his driver.

Most captains of the Pacific Fleet warships had remained on board during the weekend. Captain Charles "Savvy" Cooke, Jr., of the fleet's flagship, the USS Pennsylvania, slept aboard in his cabin. So did Captains Franklin Van Valkenburgh of the Arizona, Mervyn Bennion of the West Virginia,³ and R. Bentham Simons of the light cruiser Raleigh. But not Rear Admiral Walter Anderson, who was in command of the seven battleships tied up to Ford Island and an eighth in dry dock. Anderson spent Saturday night, December 6, in his ocean-front residence on the Maui side of Diamond Head. His battleships bore the brunt of the raid: four were sunk, four others damaged. Loss of life aboard the Arizona, the flagship of Battleship Division One, was staggering. Between 80 and 90 percent of the personnel on board were killed, including Rear Admiral Isaac Kidd, commander of BATONE, and the ship's captain, Franklin Van Valkenburgh.

There were 2,476 Navy, Marine, Army, and civilian personnel killed in the Japanese attacks of December 7. The casualties stretched across the Pacific from Pearl Harbor to Wake Island and Guam. An additional 400,000 residents of the Hawaiian Islands were placed at risk. Japan seized 1,951 Americans as prisoners of war from the military and civilian populations on Guam and Wake, and many of those POWs died while in Japanese custody.⁴

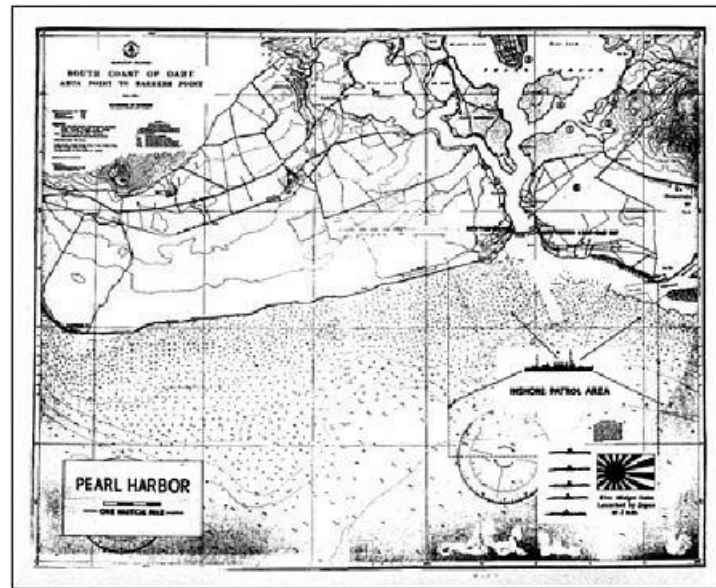

Knocking out the warships of the US Pacific Fleet was Japan's primary aim in attacking Pearl Harbor. The six carriers of the First Air Fleet carried a total of 414 aircraft and launched 360 of them in two waves at Hawaii. Fifty-four Zero fighters were reserved for combat air patrol over the carriers in case American planes located the force and retaliated. There was no retaliation of the kind Japan expected. During the first attack wave, which lasted from 7:53 to 8:25 A.M., bombers, torpedo planes, and fighters crippled the American military forces on Oahu. First, Army, Navy, and Marine airfields were bombed and strafed, destroying most of the island's air defense. Commander Mitsuo Fuchida said that the air attack was designed to first immobilize the air bases on Oahu, then temporarily knock out the Pacific Fleet by "sinking battleships and aircraft carriers."⁵ Enormous damage and a huge loss of life, delivered by 189 planes, occurred during the thirty-two minutes of the first wave. Battleship Row came under torpedo-plane assault at 7:55 A.M. From Hickam Field observers saw nine single-engine low-wing monoplanes aim at the seven battleships moored to quays on the Diamond Head side of Ford Island. Torpedoes, each equipped with a 1000-pound explosive charge, hit the battleships. One of the first was the USS Oklahoma, moored outboard of the USS Maryland, which took hits about 8:00 A.M. Huge gaps in her hull caused the warship to capsize at 8:32 A.M.

Battleship Row stood directly across the Pearl Harbor waters, about a mile from Admiral Kimmel's office. Had they been looking out on the scene, Kimmel's staff could have seen the crew of the Maryland prepare for 8:00 A.M. morning colors. On orders of their commanding officer, Captain D. C. Godwin, half the crew on board manned their battle stations, "just in case." High up in the foremast Seaman Lawrence McCutcheon, a seventeen-year-old native of Gridley, California, stood watch at his machine-gun post. At about 7:52 A.M. Lieutenant Jinichi Goto, leader of the Akagi's torpedo planes, led his pilots in the first attack on Battleship Row. Racing in from the Diamond Head side of Ford Island, Goto took aim at the Oklahoma. Low to the water—below the tops of the mainmasts of the two warships—he dropped his torpedo, then flew over both vessels firing his machine guns. At that instant a bullet tore into McCutcheon's heart, killing him instantly. His shipmates and family believe he was the first American killed that morning at Pearl Harbor.⁶

At 8:10 A.M. the forward powder magazine of the USS Arizona exploded, killing almost 90 percent of her crew. On the Ewa side of Ford Island, a separate torpedo attack hit the USS Utah, an old battleship converted for aerial gunnery practice. Her destruction was rapid. At 8:05 she took on a list of 40 degrees to port, then reached 80 percent at 8:10. Two minutes later she capsized, trapping crew members in an air bubble that formed under the bottom plates. All along Battleship Row, Japanese torpedoes or bombs found their mark. The USS California, Tennessee, West Virginia, Maryland, and Nevada took hits. Of the capital ships, only the Nevada managed to get underway and head out through the channel to open seas. But she came under attack from the Japanese planes, and her captain beached the battleship at Waipio Point rather than risk foundering in the narrow channel. It was a fortunate choice, for a sinking in the channel would have bottled up all US Pacific Fleet warships inside Pearl Harbor.

Though the warships were in Condition X-Ray—a low state of alert—firing at the attackers began promptly at 7:55. Machine guns on the USS Honolulu focused on the attackers, and fired 2000 rounds of 30-caliber ammunition. The destroyer USS Blue, fully alert by 8:00 A.M., got underway and fired her main battery of five-inch AA guns, downing an attacker. A gunner on the Blue, listed in records as Smith, became famous as the inspiration for a World War II hit song, “Praise the Lord and Pass the Ammunition,” when his ammunition hoist became jammed: “Oh, Lord! Oh, Lord! Make this ammunition hoist work just this once.” When the hoist was unjammed, gunners of the destroyer spotted a midget sub in the harbor, aimed the guns at the sub, and sank it.

Japan's first overt act of war against the United States took place in the channel entrance leading to Pearl Harbor, when five midget submarines attempted to gain entrance to the anchorage during the early morning hours of December 7. The USS Ward, patrolling the area, sank one of the subs, but at least two gained entry when the antisub nets were left open (center right). Legend: (1) Station HYPO; (2) Pacific Fleet headquarters, (3) Admiral Kimmel's residence, (4) Battleship Row and adjacent Ford Island naval airstation, (5) Pearl City peninsula, where Japanese spy Morimura watched fleet operations; and (6) Hickam Field.

Heroism ruled the morning throughout the Army, Navy, and Marine bases and the Pacific Fleet's warships. Acts of bravery and self-sacrifice by the sailors and soldiers of Oahu were awarded fifteen Congressional Medals of Honor, sixty Navy Crosses, five Distinguished Service Crosses, and sixty-five Silver Stars.

Rear Admiral Walter Anderson arrived on Battleship Row at about 9:00 A.M., as the second wave began. Though he had elected to spend Saturday night in the safety of his Diamond Head home, Anderson took charge, directed rescue efforts and damage control, and heaped praise on his officers and men: “I pay homage to the unusual exhibition of courage and magnificent fighting spirit by absolutely all the personnel of the battleships. Their conduct was in accord with the highest traditions of the service. Faced with the treacherous surprise attack on Pearl Harbor the battleship's ready guns opened fire at once.” He said the anti-aircraft fire downed between fifteen and seventeen enemy planes. He praised the courageous crews' efforts to save the ships by fighting the large and menacing oil fires.⁷

Chief Boatswain's Mate Lewis W. Adkins of the West Virginia was among scores cited for heroism: “In charge of the after repair party, his leadership and heroic conduct while fighting the fires contributed much toward saving the ship from destruction. Throughout the attack he was in an exposed position and continued to fight the fires until they were brought under control.”⁸

Uncommon bravery saved many lives. When the Utah capsized at 8:12 A.M., Fireman John Vaessen was trapped in the dynamo room, where he valiantly tried to keep the electricity flowing to the ship. As the ship began to roll over, Vaessen saw the lights dim, and then total darkness descended as he felt the battleship overturn. Trapped in an air bubble against the bottom of the hull—which was now facing skyward—Vaessen started banging on the steel. The tapping sound was heard by fellow crew members who had successfully abandoned ship and reached nearby Ford Island. Machinist S. A. Szymanski heard the tapped call for help, organized a rescue party, obtained a cutting torch, returned to the ship, and cut a hole in the bottom—where a grateful Vaessen climbed out to freedom.⁹

At 9:35 A.M. the Japanese ended the raid and began returning to their carriers. They left a heavy toll on Oahu: there were 2,273 Army and Navy dead, 1,119 wounded. Of the 101 warships in the anchorage, sixteen suffered major damage. Five were permanently out of World War II: Utah, Oklahoma, Arizona, Cassin, and Downes. The Army Air Force lost 96 planes and the Navy and Marine air bases lost 92.¹⁰

For Honolulu, the only American city ever subjected to an air raid, the human toll was equally heavy. The first civilian casualties were city firemen, called to Hickam Field in response to what they believed was a three alarm fire: Captains John J. Carreiro and Thomas S. Macy, along with Hoseman Harry L. Pang, were killed and six other firemen were injured when their fire trucks arrived at Hickam and were hit in the second wave. Four of Honolulu's residential districts were hard hit—not by the Japanese, but by exploding five-inch shells fired from the US Navy's 232 anti-aircraft guns. According to Navy testimony given to Congress, 3,188 rounds of five-inch shells were fired at the attackers; many missed their marks and rained down on the streets of Honolulu. Very little city damage occurred during the first wave—probably because the five-inch guns were not yet manned. The Honolulu Fire Department received a call at 8:00 A.M. reporting a “bomb drop” on Hala Drive near the Bishop Museum. But as the Pacific Fleet warships gradually put their AA guns into action the toll mounted in the city's neighborhoods. Six hits were reported to the Fire Department during the forty minutes of the second wave—8:50 to 9:30 A.M.

But after the Japanese pilots had returned to their carriers the civilian toll increased. Fifteen civilians were killed and scores injured by fifteen shells (called “bombs” in 1941) between 9:35 A.M. and 2:15 P.M. that afternoon. The worst was in an eight-block area surrounding McCully and South King Streets on the northern edge of Waikiki. Twelve people were killed, and homes and apartments were destroyed. Three unlucky civilian workers, rushing to their jobs at Pearl Harbor, died at 2:10 P.M. when a shell burst over their 1937 Packard sedan on Judd Street, near the Japanese consulate.¹¹

Some historians have called the Japanese military strategy at Pearl Harbor brilliant. They cite the multifaceted plans: thirty full-size submarines with five midget subs poised to sink Pacific Fleet warships fleeing the anchorage from the air attack; the early Sunday morning timing when Hawaii's military was still in a peacetime mode. Japan's strategists shared a worldwide (but mistaken) belief that a nation's naval might could be destroyed or curtailed by sinking its battleships. Pearl Harbor's Battleship Row and its old dilapidated warships presented a mouth-watering target. But it was a major strategic mistake for the Empire. Japan's 360 warplanes should have concentrated on Pearl Harbor's massive oil stores of five million barrels and destroyed the industrial capacity of the Navy's dry docks, machine shops, and repair facilities. Oahu's electrical-supply grid was untouched. Had Japan destroyed the industrial base, the blow would have stunted American response in the Pacific, forced a retreat to the West Coast, and given the Japanese military another few months of offensive operations. By the Battle of Midway in June 1942, America had regained the offensive: repaired US warships, staged from the relatively undamaged Pearl Harbor naval base, sank four of the aircraft carriers that had attacked them six months earlier.

Once the Pearl Harbor raid was over, of course, the same large fleet that had attacked with such stunning success had to escape. Their chosen escape route was northward. Most of the 360 planes of Nagumo's First Air Fleet (which lost only 26) regrouped over Kaena Point at the northwest corner of Oahu and continued in that direction. Verification of this route came at midmorning during a spectacular twenty-minute dogfight when two of the US Navy's slowest airplanes shot down a speedy Japanese Zero fighter between Kaena Point and Kauai. It left a spiraling trail of smoke as it plunged into the waters off Kauai.

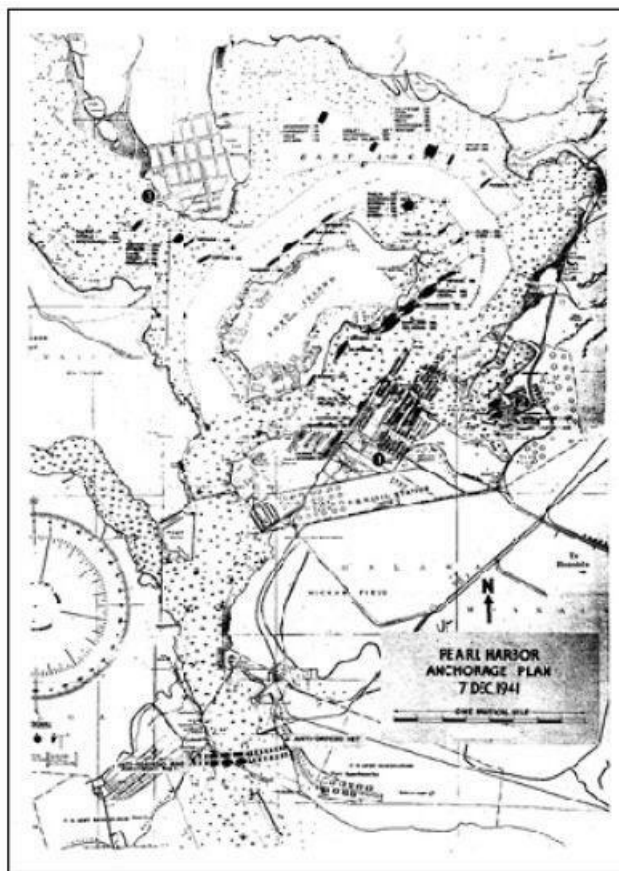

By 9:35 A.M., Japan had ended the attack. Admiral Nagumo moved his carrier fleet from the Prokofiev region toward the Mendelssohn Seamount, 200 miles northwest of Kauai. His planes followed their squadron leaders back north to their carriers. This large-scale movement of bombers and torpedo planes continued to be tracked by Army radar units as well as by Station H. Both intelligence facilities pinpointed the escape route. There was no doubt—the hostile aircraft came from, and escaped to, the north of Oahu.

Americans have never been given the full details of the First Air Fleet's escape to the north. However, bits and pieces of guarded testimony presented to various Pearl Harbor investigators between 1942 and 1946 show, when pieced together, that some American warplanes did chase after the First Air Fleet, and engaged Japanese planes in battle during the late morning and early afternoon of December 7. These dogfights extended over 150 miles of the North Pacific—from the Na Pali Coast of Kauai to near the Mendelssohn Seamount. Admiral Nagumo confirmed that the Pacific Fleet's planes pursued his force, but Admiral Kimmel never disclosed the full details of the pursuit—and missed a golden opportunity to establish himself as a forceful commander.¹²

Between 8:05 A.M. and noon, Station H radio operators and direction finder experts intercepted radio dispatches that clearly placed the First Air Fleet north of Oahu. The dispatches were originated by Nagumo, the carriers Akagi, Kaga, Zuikaku, Hiryu, and Soryu, and the battleships Kirishima and Hiei. First, Admiral Nagumo reported the successful attack to Tokyo at 8:05 A.M. Later, when a number of pilots became lost and couldn't find their way "home," the carriers broke radio silence and in plain language guided them north. Radioman First Class Donovan Chase, one of the operators at H, obtained the exact location of the carriers when the Akagi's air officer talked over the radio and guided a lost pilot: "Head northwest and you will find us." Other carriers of the First Air Fleet repeated the directions to pilots unable to find their way home: "Head north." One pilot from the carrier Kaga radioed that his fuel would last ten minutes. Chase counted out the ten minutes then added a postscript to his log: "Outa gas I hope." Another Kaga pilot said flames were engulfing his plane and he planned to jump. Chase recorded these conversations in his radio log during the opening moments of the war. They are published here for the first time.¹³

The mass exodus of the Japanese planes registered on the radarscope at the US Army's Opana radar site. Again Army privates Joseph Lockard and George Elliott picked them up and tracked them on a northerly course headed for the general area of the Mendelssohn Seamount. According to the Opana tracking chart, the planes appeared on the scope at 10:12 A.M. and went out of range at 10:39 A.M. when they were about 150 miles north of Oahu.¹⁴ But as was the case three hours earlier, none of the north exodus reports were sent to General Short.

Source: General Short's papers, Hoover Archives, Stanford University, Stanford, California.

When the bombers, torpedo planes, and fighters of the First Air Fleet arrived over Pearl Harbor at 7:53 A.M. December 7, they found the warships of the Pacific Fleet neatly tied up to docks or buoys. Destroyers and light cruisers were anchored in East Loch (top); auxiliary vessels in Middle Loch [upper left]; the Pacific Fleet's flagship, USS Pennsylvania, along with other vessels were in overhaul berths in the Navy Yard (middle); seven other battleships were moored to Ford Island (center). Legend: (1) Station HYPO; (2) Pacific Fleet headquarters at the Submarine Base; (3) China Clipper base.

Japanese pilots continued to stagger back to their carrier flight decks throughout the late morning. But some pilots of the First Air Fleet ran into trouble. Two scout planes from the heavy cruiser USS Northampton encountered a straggler about 11:30 A.M. off the west coast of Kauai and, in a twenty-minute air battle, shot it out of the sky.¹⁵

On December 16, 1941, Admiral Kimmel was relieved of his command and demoted to rear admiral.

DESTROY ANYTHING IN WRITING

UNITED STATES CAPITOL
DECEMBER 1941

COMMANDER ARTHUR MCCOLLUM'S PREDICTION OF OCTOBER 7, 1940, comes true throughout America on Monday, December 8, 1941. His Action F—keep the fleet in Hawaii—was one of the eight provocations that he said could lead to Japan committing an overt act of war, uniting America. And indeed unification was instant. Congress declared that a state of war existed with Japan, then three days later with Germany and Italy. There was one dissenter, Congresswoman Jeanette Rankin, who had also voted against United States participation in World War I. Young men ready to die for their country formed huge lines outside Army and Navy recruiting stations. Former isolationist leaders Henry Ford, Charles Lindbergh, and William Randolph Hearst joined the cry, “Remember Pearl Harbor!” Ford converted his auto factories to assembly lines for tanks. Lindbergh helped boost aircraft production and the Hearst papers championed the Administration’s war efforts. America went from a peacetime economy to full war production virtually overnight. There was no military or moral limit to the American resolve to destroy the Axis powers and win the war. But President Roosevelt sensed an underlying uneasiness stemming from Japan’s devastating attack on Hawaii. The war was only ten days old when some congressional leaders, mostly Republicans, questioned why America’s great military bastion in the Pacific had been unprepared. The Chicago Tribune, led by its publisher, Roosevelt-hater Colonel Robert McCormick, called for an independent inquiry that “can investigate in Washington.” In Topeka, Kansas, The Capital suggested that the higher-ups in the War and Navy Departments should be investigated.¹

On December 19, Republican leader Senator Robert Taft of Ohio sided with calls for an investigation: “Perhaps the fault at Hawaii was not entirely on the admirals and generals.” A Democrat, Senator Tom Connally of Texas, while supportive of the Administration, said he was amazed and astounded by the attack and found its success “almost unbelievable.” Senator Arthur Vandenberg (R., Michigan), one of the most powerful members of Congress, joined with the House Naval Affairs Committee and proposed a full inquiry into the Pearl Harbor raid. Vandenberg wrote to the President and recommended reestablishing the Committee to Conduct the War, modeled after a Congressional group that had functioned during the Civil War.²

Alarmed by the criticism leveled at the Administration and fearing that a congressional investigation would harm the war effort and provide political fodder for the 1942 elections, President Roosevelt sought a way to defuse the critics and called upon Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter for advice.³ Full disclosure of the pre-Pearl Harbor information—including McCollum’s eight actions—would have compromised American code-breaking and disclosed the US success in solving the various Japanese cryptographic systems. Therefore the President headed off a proposed congressional inquiry by appointing a five-man board of inquiry, headed by Associate Justice Owen J. Roberts of the United States Supreme Court. Frankfurter endorsed Roberts as the most “forthright of men.” But because of the need to maintain military secrecy the Roberts Commission was understandably unable to conduct a full examination or a public discussion of the Japanese naval intercepts. None of the US Navy’s intercept operators testified or produced their radio logs and documents. Nothing was revealed about them.⁴

President Roosevelt approved the Roberts Commission’s report on Saturday, January 24, 1942. It concluded that the attack was successful due to failures and errors of judgment by Admiral Kimmel and General Short. They were charged with dereliction of duty. At the same time the commission cleared General George Marshall and Admiral Harold Stark of any wrongdoing, saying they had fulfilled their command obligations. The 13,000-page report said that Japan’s success “resulted largely from a sense of security due to the opinion prevalent in diplomatic, military and naval circles, and in the public press, that any immediate attack by Japan would be in the Far East.” The United Press story, written by Joseph L. Myler,⁵ received front-page play throughout the nation. Myler wrote of the report: “After thorough investigations in Washington and Hawaii, it told an amazing story of lack of preparation, arbitrary conclusions reached by Kimmel and Short in conflict with the advice from Washington.”

Admiral James Richardson condemned the findings. “It is the most unfair, unjust, and deceptively dishonest document ever printed by the Government Printing Office. I cannot conceive of honorable men serving on the commission without greatest regret and deepest feeling of shame.”⁶ After the war ended in August 1945, Congress announced a comprehensive series of hearings intended to end all political speculation on Pearl Harbor. But in 1967, Max Freedman, the editor of Felix Frankfurter’s correspondence, chided Washington: “To this day there is an obstinate suspicion in Congress, especially among those who sat on the investigating committees, that Congress never got the full story about Pearl Harbor.”⁷

The key evidence of what really happened began to be concealed as early as December 11, 1941, only four days after the attack. The first step in the clean-up came from Rear Admiral Leigh Noyes, the Navy’s Director of Communications. He instituted the fifty-four-year censorship policy that consigned the pre-Pearl Harbor Japanese military and diplomatic intercepts and the relevant directives to Navy vaults. “Destroy all notes or anything in writing,” Noyes told a group of his subordinates on December 11.⁸ Among the group was Commander Laurance Safford, head of Station US (appointed captain in January 1942). Though head of the Navy’s cryptographic efforts, Safford reported to Noyes through Naval Communications, since it controlled all categories of service-involving communications. Safford implied that some destruction of records was carried out and added that he felt no shame or embarrassment in ordering his staff to destroy all unofficial notes.

At first Noyes denied ever issuing the destruction order, but later he admitted: “I may have instructed my subordinates to destroy personal memoranda. Nothing was said to destroy official records.” Noyes was on shaky legal ground. Personal memoranda prepared in Navy offices by Navy personnel belong to the people of the United States if the files concern naval matters. They cannot be destroyed except by authority of Congress.

Noyes’ destruction directive was issued just a few days before the formation of the presidential board of inquiries headed by Justice Roberts. His dictate set a policy that effectively excluded Japanese military intercepts from all Pearl Harbor investigations. Noyes said it was common practice to destroy “intercept stuff” after three or four months. However, some files escaped destruction. Every naval officer involved in the intercept and cryptographic operations (including those at outlying facilities) maintained a personal file at Station US for classified documents. The McCollum memorandum, for example, was discovered by the author in January 1995 in the personal classified file of Arthur McCollum.⁹

Two weeks after Japan surrendered in August 1945, the Navy blocked public access to the pre-Pearl Harbor intercepts by classifying the documents TOP SECRET. Even Congress was cut out of the intercept loop. The Navy’s order was sweeping: it gagged the cryptographers and radio intercept operators who had obtained the Japanese fleet’s radio messages during the fall of 1941. Fleet Admiral Ernest King oversaw the censorship. He threatened imprisonment and loss of Navy and veteran’s benefits to any naval personnel who disclosed the success of the code-breaking. He prophesied that “writings of irresponsible people” would test the loyalty of all concerned. “The Navy Department does not intend to dignify any stories concerning successes in Ultra [code breaking] by official denials or confirmations. I repeat that it is most important that leaks and partial disclosures be not fortified or reinforced nor further discussion stimulated by additional statements of those who know the facts from the inside.” King then reminded the code-breakers of the legal obligations embedded in their secrecy oath. The oath applied to all naval personnel, even those discharged: “The oath which you have taken must not be violated.”¹⁰

When the congressional investigation into the Pearl Harbor attack began on November 15, 1945, Americans believed they would be given full details on breaking the Japanese code prior to the attack. Witnesses introduced intercepts into evidence and read decrypted messages to the senators and representatives of the Joint Committee. It was a total sham. None of the details involving the interception, decoding, or dissemination of the pre-Pearl Harbor Japanese naval messages saw the light of day. Only diplomatic messages were released. Republicans suspected a stranglehold but could not pierce King’s gag order. Senator Owen Brewster (R., Maine) set off political fireworks when he was blocked from obtaining monitor records from the Navy’s intercept stations. But all Brewster achieved was rhetoric; he never got testimony or records of the military intercepts.

In April 1995, at the urging of the Kimmel and Short families, the Senate and House of Representatives opened a miniprobe into the circumstances leading to Japan’s attack.¹¹ Citing the fact that crucial Japanese intercept records had been denied to the Hawaiian commanders in 1941, both families sought to clear their loved ones’ reputation. They asked Congress to posthumously restore Kimmel and Short to their 1941 ranks of Admiral and Lieutenant General. Senator Strom Thurmond, chairman of the Senate Armed Forces Committee, and Representative Floyd Spence, head of the House Armed Services Committee, conducted a one-day hearing and directed that the Pentagon conduct a thorough investigation. Thurmond asked John Deutsch, Deputy Secretary of Defense, for a speedy conclusion: “When I say speedy, though, I would not ask you to act until you feel you have completed all the investigation thoroughly and feel that you’re ready to act.” Deutsch replied: “Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the Secretary of Defense William Perry, myself, and Secretary of the Navy Dalton, you have my assurance that this matter will be examined without preconception, that the judgments will be made fair on the basis of fact and with justice, and that we will speedily arrive at the best judgment we can on this matter.”

Steve Honigman, US Navy General Counsel, told Thurmond: “What I’d like to do is to state the official position of the Department today and that position is the following. In our view there are three principal reasons why Admiral Kimmel's rank should not be upgraded. The first, quite simply, is that the historical record does not establish convincingly that President Roosevelt, General Marshall, or others in Washington deliberately withheld information from Admiral Kimmel and General Short as part of a plan or a conspiracy to expose Pearl Harbor to attack in order to thrust America into the war."¹²

Thurmond then admonished the Pentagon to establish the truth and asked for "any information available anywhere that would help them [the families]." A seven-month investigation was then conducted by the Pentagon under the leadership of Undersecretary of Defense Edwin Dorn, who put together a team of civilians and military officers to thoroughly review the events leading to Pearl Harbor. The heart of their investigation centered on whether Hawaii was denied crucial intelligence.

On December 1, 1995, Dorn issued a 50-page report that rejected the petition of the Kimmel and Short families: "I cannot conclude that Admiral Kimmel and General Short were victims of unfair official actions and thus cannot conclude that the official remedy of advancement on the retired list is in order." Dorn said he agreed with conclusions drawn consistently over several investigations, that Admiral Kimmel and General Short committed errors of judgment. "As commanders, they were accountable."¹³

But Dorn's promised thorough review lacked crucial elements. His investigative team did not produce the Japanese naval intercepts, nor did they interview Captains Duane Whitlock and Homer Kisner, the US Navy's radio traffic experts in 1941. Dorn did not produce or reveal McCollum's memorandum listing eight actions that were allowed to proceed by President Roosevelt. Missing from Dorn's investigation was America's foremost expert on the Japanese naval intercepts, John Taylor, senior researcher at Archives II. Taylor said neither Dorn nor his investigative team contacted him for documents.¹⁴

Why has it been so difficult to pry loose the truth of Pearl Harbor, this mystery that haunts American history? This book is certainly not the first time President Roosevelt's pre-Pearl Harbor strategy has been raised. Since September 1945, many authors and historians have expressed the belief that Roosevelt knew of the impending attack by the Japanese. What they didn't know—but is the heart of this book—was that a systematic plan had been in place long before Pearl Harbor that would climax with the attack.

As heinous as it seems to families and veterans of World War II, of which the author is one, the Pearl Harbor attack was, from the White House perspective, something that had to be endured in order to stop a greater evil—the Nazi invaders in Europe who had begun the Holocaust and were poised to invade England. There could be disagreement on whether the plan adopted was the right way to stop Hitler, but Roosevelt faced a terrible dilemma.

Despite his pleadings and persuasions, powerful isolationist forces prevented Roosevelt from getting into the European war. Roosevelt's advisors included American patriots such as General George Marshall, Rear Admiral Walter S. Anderson, and Commander Arthur H. McCollum who understood the need to arouse the United States from its isolationist position.

The wisdom and moral justification for the decision to provoke Japan into a bloody and terrible war that ultimately took millions of lives will be argued over for many years by people of good faith and from all political persuasions.

This book does not purport to resolve such dilemmas. What truths it uncovers from the distant past can only shed more light on a troubling time in our country's history.

The truth that has been told here does not diminish Franklin Delano Roosevelt's magnificent contributions to the American people. His legacy should not be tarnished by the truth. As with all American presidents, Roosevelt must be viewed in the total context of his administration, not just Pearl Harbor.

The real shame is on the stewards of government who have kept the truth under lock for fifty years. Had the facts uncovered in this book been known immediately after the war ended, and had Roosevelt explained his war strategies and tactics to the families who lost their sons at Pearl Harbor, how different American history might be viewed today. But President Roosevelt died in office on April 1945, four months before Japan surrendered. It may have been necessary for wartime security to withhold the truth about Pearl Harbor until the war ended, but to do so for more than half a century grossly distorted the world's view of American history.

Over that time, most of the US military leaders, cryptographers, and intercept operators who were either participants or witnesses to events leading to Pearl Harbor have died or their memories have faded with age. Because they were never called to testify for their country, we have been denied a full account of what happened from their perspectives.

To those heretofore silent survivors who are represented in this book, we owe an immeasurable debt.

McCOLLUM'S ACTION PROPOSAL

LIEUTENANT COMMANDER ARTHUR McCOLLUM'S

MEMORANDUM OF OCTOBER 7, 1940

Includes endorsement by Captain Dudley Knox

Lieutenant Commander Arthur McCollum's proposed eight actions, designed to provoke Japan into an overt act of war, were discovered by the author in Box 6 of a special US Navy collection in RG 38 in the Military Reference Branch of Archives II, January 24, 1995.

REPRODUCED AT THE
NATIONAL ARCHIVES

DETERMINED TO BE AN ADMINISTRATIVE MARKING
E.O. 12065, Section 6-102
By AT...MARS, Date 1-29-65

OP-16-F-2 ONI 7 OCTOBER 1940

~~CONFIDENTIAL~~ MEMORANDUM FOR THE DIRECTOR

SUBJECT: ESTIMATE OF THE SITUATION IN THE PACIFIC AND RECOMMENDATIONS FOR ACTION BY THE UNITED STATES.

1. THE UNITED STATES TODAY FINDS HERSELF CONFRONTED BY A HOSTILE GERMANY AND ITALY IN EUROPE AND BY AN EQUALLY HOSTILE JAPAN IN THE ORIENT. RUSSIA, THE GREAT LAND LINK BETWEEN THESE TWO GROUPS OF HOSTILE POWERS, IS AT PRESENT NEUTRAL, BUT IN ALL PROBABILITY FAVORABLY INCLINED TOWARDS THE AXIS POWERS, AND HER FAVORABLE ATTITUDE TOWARDS THESE POWERS MAY BE EXPECTED TO INCREASE IN DIRECT PROPORTION TO INCREASING SUCCESS IN THEIR PROSECUTION OF THE WAR IN EUROPE. GERMANY AND ITALY HAVE BEEN SUCCESSFUL IN WAR ON THE CONTINENT OF EUROPE AND ALL OF EUROPE IS EITHER UNDER THEIR MILITARY CONTROL OR HAS BEEN FORCED INTO SUBSERVIENCE. ONLY THE BRITISH EMPIRE IS ACTIVELY OPPOSING BY WAR THE GROWING WORLD DOMINANCE OF GERMANY AND ITALY AND THEIR SATELLITES.

2. THE UNITED STATES AT FIRST REMAINED COOLLY ALDOOF FROM THE CONFLICT IN EUROPE AND THERE IS CONSIDERABLE EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT THE VIEW THAT GERMANY AND ITALY ATTEMPTED BY EVERY METHOD WITHIN THEIR POWER TO FOSTER A CONTINUATION OF AMERICAN INDIFFERENCE TO THE OUTCOME OF THE STRUGGLE IN EUROPE. PARADOXICALLY, EVERY SUCCESS OF GERMAN AND ITALIAN ARMS HAS LED TO FURTHER INCREASES IN UNITED STATES SYMPATHY FOR AND MATERIAL SUPPORT OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE, UNTIL AT THE PRESENT TIME THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT STANDS COMMITTED TO A POLICY OF RENDERING EVERY SUPPORT SHORT OF WAR WITH THE CHANCES RAPIDLY INCREASING THAT THE UNITED STATES WILL BECOME A FULL FLEDGED ALLY OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE IN THE VERY NEAR FUTURE. THE FINAL FAILURE OF GERMAN AND ITALIAN DIPLOMACY TO KEEP THE UNITED STATES IN THE ROLE OF A DISINTERESTED SPECTATOR HAS FORCED THEM TO ADOPT THE POLICY OF DEVELOPING THREATS TO U.S. SECURITY IN OTHER SPHERES OF THE WORLD, NOTABLY BY THE THREAT OF REVOLUTIONS IN SOUTH AND CENTRAL AMERICA BY AXIS-DOMINATED GROUPS AND BY THE STIMULATION OF JAPAN TO FURTHER AGGRESSIONS AND THREATS IN THE FAR EAST IN THE HOPE THAT BY THESE MEANS THE UNITED STATES WOULD BECOME SO CONFUSED IN THOUGHT AND FEARFUL OF HER OWN IMMEDIATE SECURITY AS TO CAUSE HER TO BECOME SO PREOCCUPIED IN PURELY DEFENSIVE PREPARATIONS AS TO VIRTUALLY PRECLUDE U.S. AID TO GREAT BRITAIN IN ANY FORM. AS A RESULT OF THIS POLICY, GERMANY AND ITALY HAVE LATELY CONCLUDED A MILITARY ALLIANCE WITH JAPAN DIRECTED AGAINST THE UNITED STATES. IF THE PUBLISHED TERMS OF THIS TREATY AND THE POINTED UTTERANCES OF GERMAN, ITALIAN AND JAPANESE LEADERS CAN BE BELIEVED, AND THERE SEEMS NO GROUND ON WHICH TO DOUBT EITHER, THE THREE TOTALITARIAN POWERS AGREE TO MAKE WAR ON THE UNITED STATES, SHOULD SHE COME TO THE ASSISTANCE OF ENGLAND, OR SHOULD SHE ATTEMPT TO FORCIBLY INTERFERE WITH JAPAN'S AIMS IN THE ORIENT AND,

FURTHERMORE, GERMANY AND ITALY EXPRESSLY RESERVE THE RIGHT TO DETERMINE WHETHER AMERICAN AID TO BRITAIN, SHORT OF WAR, IS A CAUSE FOR WAR OR NOT AFTER THEY HAVE SUCCEEDED IN DEFEATING ENGLAND. IN OTHER WORDS, AFTER ENGLAND HAS BEEN DEPOSED OF HER ENEMIES WILL DECIDE WHETHER OR NOT TO IMMEDIATELY PROCEED WITH AN ATTACK ON THE UNITED STATES. DUE TO GEOGRAPHIC CONDITIONS, NEITHER GERMANY NOR ITALY ARE IN A POSITION TO OFFER ANY MATERIAL AID TO JAPAN. JAPAN, ON THE CONTRARY, CAN BE OF MUCH HELP TO BOTH GERMANY AND ITALY BY THREATENING AND POSSIBLY EVEN ATTACKING BRITISH DOMINIONS AND SUPPLY ROUTES FROM AUSTRALIA, INDIA AND THE DUTCH EAST INDIES, THUS MATERIALLY WEAKENING BRITAIN'S POSITION IN OPPOSITION TO THE AXIS POWERS IN EUROPE. IN EXCHANGE FOR THIS SERVICE, JAPAN RECEIVES A FREE HAND TO SEIZE ALL OF ASIA THAT SHE CAN FIND IT POSSIBLE TO GRAB, WITH THE ADDED PROMISE THAT GERMANY AND ITALY WILL DO ALL IN THEIR POWER TO KEEP U.S. ATTENTION SO ATTRACTED AS TO PREVENT THE UNITED STATES FROM TAKING POSITIVE AGGRESSIVE ACTION AGAINST JAPAN. HERE AGAIN WE HAVE ANOTHER EXAMPLE OF THE AXIS-JAPANESE DIPLOMACY WHICH IS AIMED AT KEEPING AMERICAN POWER IMMobilIZED, AND BY THREATS AND ALARMS TO SO CONFUSE AMERICAN THOUGHT AS TO PRECLUDE PROMPT DECISIVE ACTION BY THE UNITED STATES IN EITHER SPHERE OF ACTION. IT CANNOT BE EMPHASIZED TOO STRONGLY THAT THE LAST THING DESIRED BY EITHER THE AXIS POWERS IN EUROPE OR BY JAPAN IN THE FAR EAST IS PROMPT, WARLIKE ACTION BY THE UNITED STATES IN EITHER THEATER OF OPERATIONS.

3. AN EXAMINATION OF THE SITUATION IN EUROPE LEADS TO THE CONCLUSION THAT THERE IS LITTLE THAT WE CAN DO NOW, IMMEDIATELY, TO HELP BRITAIN THAT IS NOT ALREADY BEING DONE. WE HAVE NO TRAINED ARMY TO SEND TO THE ASSISTANCE OF ENGLAND, NOR WILL WE HAVE FOR AT LEAST A YEAR. WE ARE NOW TRYING TO INCREASE THE FLOW OF MATERIALS TO ENGLAND AND TO BOLSTER THE DEFENSE OF ENGLAND IN EVERY PRACTICABLE WAY AND THIS AID WILL UNDOUBTEDLY BE INCREASED. ON THE OTHER HAND, THERE IS LITTLE THAT GERMANY OR ITALY CAN DO AGAINST US AS LONG AS ENGLAND CONTINUES IN THE WAR AND HER NAVY MAINTAINS CONTROL OF THE ATLANTIC. THE ONE DANGER TO OUR POSITION LIES IN THE POSSIBLE EARLY DEFEAT OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE WITH THE BRITISH FLEET FALLING INTO THE HANDS OF THE AXIS POWERS. THE POSSIBILITY OF SUCH AN EVENT OCCURRING WOULD BE MATERIALLY LESSENED WERE WE ACTUALLY ALLIED IN WAR WITH THE BRITISH OR AT THE VERY LEAST WERE TAKING ACTIVE MEASURES TO RELIEVE THE PRESSURE ON BRITAIN IN OTHER SPHERES OF ACTION. TO SUM UP: THE THREAT TO OUR SECURITY IN THE ATLANTIC REMAINS SMALL SO LONG AS THE BRITISH FLEET REMAINS DOMINANT IN THAT OCEAN AND FRIENDLY TO THE UNITED STATES.

4. IN THE PACIFIC, JAPAN BY VIRTUE OF HER ALLIANCE WITH GERMANY AND ITALY IS A DEFINITE THREAT TO THE SECURITY OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE AND ONCE THE BRITISH EMPIRE IS GONE THE POWER OF JAPAN-GERMANY AND ITALY IS TO BE DIRECTED AGAINST THE UNITED STATES. A POWERFUL LAND ATTACK BY GERMANY AND ITALY THROUGH THE BALKANS AND NORTH AFRICA AGAINST THE SUEZ CANAL WITH A JAPANESE THREAT OR ATTACK ON SINGAPORE WOULD HAVE VERY SERIOUS RESULTS FOR THE BRITISH EMPIRE. COULD JAPAN BE DIVERTED OR NEUTRALIZED, THE FRUITS OF A SUCCESSFUL ATTACK ON THE SUEZ CANAL COULD NOT BE AS FAR REACHING AND BENEFICIAL TO THE AXIS POWERS AS IF SUCH SUCCESS WAS ALSO ACCOMPANIED BY THE VIRTUAL ELIMINATION OF BRITISH SEA POWER FROM THE INDIAN OCEAN, THUS

OPENING UP A EUROPEAN SUPPLY ROUTE FOR JAPAN AND A SEA ROUTE FOR EASTERN RAW MATERIALS TO REACH GERMANY AND ITALY. JAPAN MUST BE DIVERTED IF THE BRITISH AND AMERICAN [X] BLOCKADE OF EUROPE AND POSSIBLY JAPAN [?] IS TO REMAIN EVEN PARTIALLY IN EFFECT.

5. WHILE AS POINTED OUT IN PARAGRAPH (3) THERE IS LITTLE THAT THE UNITED STATES CAN DO TO IMMEDIATELY RETRIEVE THE SITUATION IN EUROPE, THE UNITED STATES IS ABLE TO EFFECTIVELY NULLIFY JAPANESE AGGRESSIVE ACTION, AND DO IT WITHOUT LESSENING U.S. MATERIAL ASSISTANCE TO GREAT BRITAIN.

6. AN EXAMINATION OF JAPAN'S PRESENT POSITION AS OPPOSED TO THE UNITED STATES REVEALS A SITUATION AS FOLLOWS:

ADVANTAGES

1. GEOGRAPHICALLY STRONG POSITION OF JAPANESE ISLANDS.
2. A HIGHLY CENTRALIZED STRONG CAPABLE GOVERNMENT.
3. RIGID CONTROL OF ECONOMY ON A WAR BASIS.
4. A PEOPLE INURED TO HANDSHIP AND WAR.
5. A POWERFUL ARMY.
6. A SKILLFUL NAVY ABOUT 2/3 THE STRENGTH OF THE U.S. NAVY.
7. SOME STOCKS OF RAW MATERIALS.
8. WEATHER UNTIL APRIL RENDERING DIRECT SEA OPERATIONS IN THE VICINITY OF JAPAN DIFFICULT.

DISADVANTAGES

1. A MILLION AND A HALF MEN ENGAGED IN AN EXHAUSTING WAR ON THE ASIATIC CONTINENT.
2. DOMESTIC ECONOMY AND FOOD SUPPLY SEVERELY STRAIGHTENED.
3. A SERIOUS LACK OF SOURCES OF RAW MATERIALS FOR WAR, NOTABLY OIL, IRON AND COTTON.
4. TOTALLY CUT OFF FROM SUPPLIES FROM EUROPE.
5. DEPENDENT UPON DISTANT OVERSEAS ROUTES FOR ESSENTIAL SUPPLIES.
6. INCAPABLE OF INCREASING MANUFACTURE AND SUPPLY OF WAR MATERIALS WITHOUT FREE ACCESS TO U.S. OR EUROPEAN MARKETS.
7. MAJOR OILIER AND INDUSTRIAL CENTERS EXTREMELY VULNERABLE TO AIR ATTACK.

7. IN THE PACIFIC THE UNITED STATES POSSESSES A VERY STRONG DEFENSIVE POSITION AND A NAVY AND NAVAL AIR FORCE AT PRESENT IN THAT OCEAN CAPABLE OF LONG DISTANCE OFFENSIVE OPERATION. THERE ARE CERTAIN OTHER FACTORS WHICH AT THE PRESENT TIME ARE STRONGLY IN OUR FAVOR, VIZ:

- A. PHILIPPINE ISLANDS STILL HELD BY THE UNITED STATES.
- B. FRIENDLY AND POSSIBLY ALLIED GOVERNMENT IN CONTROL OF THE DUTCH EAST INDIES.
- C. BRITISH STILL HOLD HONGKONG AND SINGAPORE AND ARE FAVORABLE TO US.
- D. IMPORTANT CHINESE ARMIES ARE STILL IN THE FIELD IN CHINA AGAINST JAPAN.
- E. A SMALL U.S. NAVAL FORCE CAPABLE OF SERIOUSLY THREATENING JAPAN'S SOUTHERN SUPPLY ROUTES.

REPRODUCED AS THE
NATIONAL ARCHIVES

DETERMINED TO BE AN ADMINISTRATIVE MARKING
E.O. 12065, Section 6-102
BY AT NARS, Date 1-29-81

ALREADY IN THE THEATER OF OPERATIONS...
F. A CONSIDERABLE DUTCH NAVAL FORCE IS IN THE ORIENT THAT WOULD BE OF VALUE IF ALLIED TO U.S.

8. A CONSIDERATION OF THE FOREGOING LEADS TO THE CONCLUSION THAT PROMPT AGGRESSIVE NAVAL ACTION AGAINST JAPAN BY THE UNITED STATES WOULD RENDER JAPAN INCAPABLE OF AFFORDING ANY HELP TO GERMANY AND ITALY IN THEIR ATTACK ON ENGLAND AND THAT JAPAN ITSELF WOULD BE FACED WITH A SITUATION IN WHICH HER NAVY COULD BE FORCED TO FIGHT ON MOST UNFAVORABLE TERMS OR ACCEPT FAIRLY EARLY COLLAPSE OF THE COUNTRY THROUGH THE FORCE OF BLOCKADE. A PROMPT AND EARLY DECLARATION OF WAR AFTER ENTERING INTO SUITABLE ARRANGEMENTS WITH ENGLAND AND HOLLAND, WOULD BE MOST EFFECTIVE IN BRINGING ABOUT THE EARLY COLLAPSE OF JAPAN AND THUS ELIMINATING OUR ENEMY IN THE PACIFIC BEFORE GERMANY AND ITALY COULD STRIKE AT US EFFECTIVELY. FURTHERMORE, ELIMINATION OF JAPAN MUST SURELY STRENGTHEN BRITAIN'S POSITION AGAINST GERMANY AND ITALY AND, IN ADDITION, SUCH ACTION WOULD INCREASE THE CONFIDENCE AND SUPPORT OF ALL NATIONS WHO TEND TO BE FRIENDLY TOWARDS US.

9. IT IS NOT BELIEVED THAT IN THE PRESENT STATE OF POLITICAL OPINION THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT IS CAPABLE OF DECLARING WAR AGAINST JAPAN WITHOUT MORE AID; AND IT IS BARELY POSSIBLE THAT VIGOROUS ACTION ON OUR PART MIGHT LEAD THE JAPANESE TO MODIFY THEIR ATTITUDE. THEREFORE, THE FOLLOWING COURSE OF ACTION IS SUGGESTED:

- A. MAKE AN ARRANGEMENT WITH BRITAIN FOR THE USE OF BRITISH BASES IN THE PACIFIC, PARTICULARLY SINGAPORE.
- B. MAKE AN ARRANGEMENT WITH HOLLAND FOR THE USE OF BASE FACILITIES AND ACQUISITION OF SUPPLIES IN THE DUTCH EAST INDIES.
- C. GIVE ALL POSSIBLE AID TO THE CHINESE GOVERNMENT OF CUANG-KAI-SHEK.
- D. SEND A DIVISION OF LONG RANGE HEAVY CRUISERS TO THE ORIENT, PHILIPPINES, OR SINGAPORE.
- E. SEND TWO DIVISIONS OF SUBMARINES TO THE ORIENT.
- F. KEEP THE MAIN STRENGTH OF THE U.S. FLEET NOW IN THE PACIFIC IN THE VICINITY OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.
- G. INSIST THAT THE DUTCH REFUSE TO GRANT JAPANESE DEMANDS FOR UNDUE ECONOMIC CONCESSIONS, PARTICULARLY OIL.
- H. COMPLETELY EMBARGO ALL U.S. TRADE WITH JAPAN, IN COLLABORATION WITH A SIMILAR EMBARGO IMPOSED BY THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

10. IF BY THESE MEANS JAPAN COULD BE LED TO COMMIT AN OVERT ACT OF WAR, SO MUCH THE BETTER. AT ALL EVENTS WE MUST BE FULLY PREPARED TO ACCEPT THE THREAT OF WAR.

CC-OP-16
OP-16-F
FILE

A.H. McCOLLUM ✓

REPRODUCED AS THE
NATIONAL ARCHIVES

DETERMINED TO BE AN ADMINISTRATIVE MARKING
E.O. 12065, Section 6-102
BY AT NARS, Date 1-29-81

OP-16-F-2 ONI

7 OCTOBER 1940

SUMMARY

1. THE UNITED STATES IS FACED BY A HOSTILE COMBINATION OF POWERS IN BOTH THE ATLANTIC AND THE PACIFIC.
2. BRITISH NAVAL CONTROL OF THE ATLANTIC PREVENTS HOSTILE ACTION AGAINST THE UNITED STATES IN THIS AREA.
3. JAPAN'S GROWING HOSTILITY PRESAGES AN ATTEMPT TO OPEN SEA COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN JAPAN AND THE MEDITERRANEAN BY AN ATTACK ON THE BRITISH LINES OF COMMUNICATION IN THE INDIAN OCEAN.
4. JAPAN MUST BE DIVERTED IF BRITISH OPPOSITION IN EUROPE IS TO REMAIN EFFECTIVE.
5. THE UNITED STATES NAVAL FORCES NOW IN THE PACIFIC ARE CAPABLE OF SO CONTAINING AND HARASSING JAPAN AS TO NULLIFY HER ASSISTANCE TO GERMANY AND ITALY.
6. IT IS TO THE INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES TO ELIMINATE JAPAN'S THREAT IN THE PACIFIC AT THE EARLIEST OPPORTUNITY BY TAKING PROMPT AND AGGRESSIVE ACTION AGAINST JAPAN.
7. IN THE ABSENCE OF UNITED STATES ABILITY TO TAKE THE POLITICAL OFFENSIVE, ADDITIONAL NAVAL FORCES SHOULD BE SENT TO THE ORIENT AND AGREEMENTS ENTERED INTO WITH HOLLAND AND ENGLAND THAT WOULD SERVE AS AN EFFECTIVE CHECK AGAINST JAPANESE ENCROACHMENTS IN SOUTH-EASTERN ASIA.

REPRODUCED AT THE
NATIONAL ARCHIVES

DETERMINED TO BE AN ADMINISTRATIVE MARRING
E.O. 12066, Section 6-102
BY AJ NARS, Date 1-29-95

~~CONFIDENTIAL~~

COMMENT BY CAPTAIN KNOX

IT IS UNQUESTIONABLY TO OUR GENERAL INTEREST THAT BRITAIN BE NOT LICKED - JUST NOW SHE HAS A STALEMATE AND PROBABLY CANT DO BETTER. WE OUGHT TO MAKE IT CERTAIN THAT SHE AT LEAST GETS A STALEMATE. FOR THIS SHE WILL PROBABLY NEED FROM US SUBSTANTIAL FURTHER DESTROYERS AND AIR REINFORCE-MENTS TO ENGLAND. WE SHOULD NOT PRECIPITATE ANYTHING IN THE ORIENT THAT WOULD HAMPER OUR ABILITY TO DO THIS - SO LONG AS PROBABILITY CONTINUES.

IF ENGLAND REMAINS STABLE, JAPAN WILL BE CAUTIOUS
IN THE ORIENT. HENCE OUR ASSISTANCE TO ENGLAND IN THE ATLANTIC IS ALSO PROTECTION TO HER AND US IN THE ORIENT.

HOWEVER, I CONCUR IN YOUR COURSE OF ACTION
WE MUST BE READY ON BOTH SIDES AND PROBABLY STRONG ENOUGH TO CARE FOR BOTH.

D.W.K.

RE YOUR #6: - NO REASON FOR BATTLESHIPS NOT VISITING WEST COAST IN BUNCHES.

RESEARCH FOR DAY OF DECEIT

The principal archival sources for this book are in the Pacific War communications intelligence (COMINT) files of the United States Navy maintained by the US Navy Security Group Command, the successor of Station US—the Navy’s communications intelligence headquarters in 1941. The author learned of the existence of the files in 1983, filed a FOIA request with the Navy, and specifically requested immediate declassification of the entire file pertaining in any manner to the Pearl Harbor attack. In 1983 these records were classified TOP SECRET CODEWORD and TOP SECRET CREAM—one of the highest classification categories of the US government. Except for a few documents, the author’s request was denied.

The FOIA constituted a legal “information lien” on the classified COMINT documents. In June 1994, the Navy decided to declassify the records. The files were transferred by truck convoy from the Navy Security Group Command depository in Crane, Indiana, to Archives II, operated by National Archives on the campus of the University of Maryland at College Park, which is inside the Beltway that encircles Washington. Title to the records passed from the Navy to Archives II and the documents were free at last. The author’s FOIA “information lien” on the records was honored by Clarence Lyons, then director of the Textual Reference Branch at Archives II. Lyons made a portion of the COMINT documents available to the author on January 23, 1995. The remaining records were in various stages of cataloguing.

As of 1999, these COMINT files are located in Record Group 38 of the Modern Military Records Branch at Archives II, and are known as the Station US Papers or Crane Files (after the depository). Timothy Nenninger, who replaced Lyons in 1998, estimated that the Station US papers contain over one million documents. As this book goes to press in 1999, declassification and cataloguing of the Station US papers continues under Nenninger’s direction.

The Pacific War COMINT files in Archives II are not the last word on the subject. Three National Archives regional depositories—in Laguna Niguel and San Bruno, California, and Seattle, Washington—contain important Pearl Harbor documents not found in the Archives II records.

At first glance some readers may puzzle over the intricacies of communications intelligence and the way it can reveal an opponent’s strategy and tactics. It is very similar to listening to police and fire department radios in a newsroom. A din of routine transmissions generates a normal buzz—but if a major crime or fire is reported transmissions pick up and excited voices are heard. This jump from the normal gets attention and alerts the editor and reporters that major news is occurring. The same is true in military communications. When communications between units and commands suddenly increase manyfold and the increase is sustained, the alert intelligence command senses trouble. Captain Duane Whitlock, a radio traffic analyst at Station CAST on Corregidor, told the author that he received stacks of Japanese naval broadcasts during the last days of peace of 1941—way above normal: “It was not necessary to decipher the coded messages. I was fully convinced that Japan was gearing up for war based on the huge increase of orders transmitted to the warships and military commands.”

This book’s main archival sources are listed below.

Archivists consulted: R. Michael McReynolds, Clarence Lyons, John Taylor, Timothy Nenner, Richard A. von Doenhoff, Barry L. Zerbe, Dick Mackay, JoAnn Williamson, Vernon R. Smith, Richard L. Boylan, Timothy P. Mulligan, Wilbert B. Mahoney, Richard H. Rayburn, Theresa Hammett. Superintendent of the Research Room: Calvin Jefferson.

National Archives filing policy is focused on Record Groups. The principal military record groups used by the author in researching Pearl Harbor records at Archives II were:

Pearl Harbor Liaison Office Files (PHLO), in Record Group 80

These comprise a declassified collection of documents gathered for the Pearl Harbor Joint Congressional Investigation Committee (JOINT) of 1945–46. President Harry S. Truman and Senator Alben Barkley (D., Kentucky), chairman of the investigating committee, set the national policy pertaining to testimony of witnesses and declassification of documents scheduled to appear before JOINT. In his first policy memorandum to the committee on the matter, dated August 28, 1945, President Truman curtailed presentation of evidence concerning the success of any US governmental cryptanalytic unit. His prohibition was directed to several officials of his Administration: the Secretaries of State, War, and Navy, the Attorney General, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Director of the Budget, and the Director of the Office of War Information: “Appropriate departments of the Government and the Joint Chiefs of Staff are hereby directed to take such steps as are necessary to prevent release to the public, except with the specific approval of the President in each case, of: Information regarding the past or present status, technique or procedures, degree of success attained, or any specific results of any cryptanalytic unit acting under the authority of the US Government or any Department thereof” /ss/ Harry S. Truman.

Senator Barkley asked for a modification of the order on October 5, 1945. President Truman relented with a new memorandum on October 26 in which he eased the release of information concerning cryptanalytic activities: “The State, War and Navy Departments will make available to the Joint Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbor attack, for such use as the Committee may determine, any information in their possession material to the investigation, and will respectively authorize any employee or member of the armed services whose testimony is desired by the Committee to testify publicly before the Committee concerning any matter pertinent to the investigation” /ss/ Harry S. Truman. [See the Truman-Barkley interchange, on file at the Truman Presidential Library, Independence, Missouri.]

During the course of the Truman-Barkley interchange, Fleet Admiral Ernest King attempted to prevent the intercepted Japanese 5-Num code dispatches and other communications intelligence activities from becoming public. King specifically asked Secretary of the Navy James Forrestal to override Truman’s memorandum and prohibit witnesses [Navy intercept operators] from testifying either directly or indirectly concerning information obtained through cryptanalysis. [King to SECNAV, Oct. 1, 1945, Serial 8313, Station US Papers, MMRB, RG 38, Archives II.]

President Truman apparently became aware of King’s directives attempting to curtail the testimony. Admiral King warned that any naval personnel who disclosed cryptographic information would be subject to naval discipline. Truman countered with a November 7, 1945, memorandum ordering protection for any witness before the Committee: “The testimony of any person in the armed services, and the fact that such person testified before the joint committee herein provided for, shall not be used against him in any court proceeding or held against him in examining his military status for credits in the service to which he belongs.”

The President concluded his memorandum by requesting all Americans to come forward and provide any information of which they might have knowledge bearing on the subject of the Committee’s investigation. Two days later he reiterated his request with another expanded memorandum, which called for all Americans to come forward and disclose information to the Committee. Truman added a caveat: “This does not include any files or written materials.” But Fleet Admiral King prevailed. In the end, King won the battle of the memorandums. None of the Navy’s intercept operators—the 165 members of the On The Roof Gang—testified. Not one of their military intercepts of Japanese naval radio broadcasts was introduced into evidence before the Committee. America’s pre-Pearl Harbor success in obtaining, decrypting, and translating the Japanese naval messages in the 5-Num code was safe.

Most of the documents, evidence, and testimony heard by JOINT were reproduced in the official 39-volume transcript. But the most important records involving communications intelligence were omitted. None of the Station US papers—which contain the crucial Japanese military intercepts—were shown to Congress in either the 1945–46 or the 1995 Pearl Harbor investigations.

My original research into Pearl Harbor files began in Archives I, located at Seventh Street and Pennsylvania Avenue in downtown Washington. In 1994 the United States military history records were moved to a magnificent new depository on the campus of the University of Maryland at College Park, called Archives II. When Congress closed down the government in late 1994, funds for preserving records in the National Archives were curtailed. During research in the Archives I and II depositories, I noted rapid physical deterioration of the Pacific Fleet's Incoming and Outgoing radio message files (labeled SECRET and CONFIDENTIAL) for the pre-Pearl Harbor period. These records are fading and turning to dust because they were not properly stored in archival safe boxes. Cardboard boxes and some fiber products are unsuitable for archival storage because they contain toxins. Storage containers should have a neutral pH rating, which guarantees toxins are not present to destroy records. The pH safe boxes cost about $2 each.

The Pacific Fleet's radio message file was not printed in JOINT and constitutes some of the most crucial United States historical records of the pre-December 7, 1941, period. If not properly preserved in accordance with National Archives guidelines, the documents will be lost to future generations. I made an attempt to preserve some of the records by photographing the deteriorating documents with my Nikon 35-mm camera.

Station US Papers, a.k.a. Crane Files, in RG 38

The entire file is estimated to contain at least a million documents, according to Timothy Nenninger, Director of the Modern Military Records Branch. The original release of a portion of these documents—stored in 20 pH-safe boxes and three unsafe corrugated boxes—took place on January 23, 1995.

Other Record Groups consulted in the National Archives were:

Deck logs of US Navy vessels in RG 24.

Chief of Naval Operations files, 1940–41, RG 38.

Office of Naval Intelligence, RG 38.

Still Picture Branch, RG 80, for photographs.

Diplomatic Branch RG 59, State Department Decimal File.

President Jimmy Carter's limited release of the 1941 Japanese naval messages, with the blackouts, can be found in RG 457. The uncensored versions are in the Station US papers. Neither the censored nor the uncensored documents are arranged in chronological order or categorized by intercept stations. John Taylor, supervising archivist of RG 457, said the censored Carter documents were prepared and released to National Archives by the National Security Agency (NSA). Officials at NSA object to the use of the word censored; they prefer redacted.

Diplomatic Branch, Archives II, 8601 Adelphi Road, College Park, Maryland

These are State Department decimal files, 1940–44, in RG 59. They contain details of the removal of Japanese consulate members from Hawaii in spring 1942.

Department of Defense, The Pentagon

See The Magic Background of Pearl Harbor, originally printed by the US Government Printing Office. This is an eight-volume set of translations of communications intelligence involving intercepted Japanese diplomatic messages. It was published by Department of Defense (DOD) in 1977; no editor is listed. It lacks intercepts of Japanese naval communications, except incomplete references extracted from Daily Communications Summaries issued by Station HYPO. Volumes I and V combine appendix and narrative; Volumes II, III, and IV are separated into appendix and narrative.

The eight volumes lack crucial details concerning the interception of the diplomatic messages. There is no DOD explanation for the absence of the Japanese naval messages intercepted by US naval monitors in the Pacific. A foreword by the unnamed editor is misleading: “It was decided in the public interest to declassify the intelligence which the United States obtained from the communications of its World War II enemies.” Japanese communications data pertaining to each message—usually included in such documents—are missing. There is no way to authenticate the intercepts.

Fred Close was archivist in charge of Pearl Harbor–era records.

See RG 181 for records of the Eleventh Naval District. Communications intelligence can be found in the A-6 files labeled SECRET and CONFIDENTIAL. They contain copies of communications intelligence records originated by various other naval districts and not found in other depositories.

National Archives, Pacific Sierra Region, 1000 Commodore Drive, San Bruno, California

Archivists: David Drake, Michael Anderson, Waverly B. Lowell, Gary Cramer, Kathleen M.O'Connor

Contains files of the Twelfth (San Francisco), Fourteenth (Hawaii and Central Pacific), and Sixteenth (Philippines) Naval Districts. See RG 181 and its A-6 file category in the SECRET and CONFIDENTIAL storage boxes. See Port Director file, San Francisco, for the mysterious SS Lurline controversy.

National Archives, 6125 Sand Point Way NE, Seattle, Washington

Archivists: Donald Piff, Joyce Justice, Janusz Wilczek, and Dwight Grinolds

See RG 181, subsection A-6, for SECRET and CONFIDENTIAL files of the Thirteenth Naval District. Contains files of the West Coast Communications Intelligence Network; Station KING, Dutch Harbor; Station AE, Sitka, Territory of Alaska; Station SAIL, Bainbridge Island, Washington. Every storage box in RG 181 must be checked to locate COMINT files, which were scattered haphazardly throughout the collection by Navy yeomen before their acquisition by the National Archives.

University of Hawaii, Manoa Campus, Honolulu, Hawaii

Pacific War Records Depository in the Hamilton Library. Personal accounts by Hawaiian residents of December 7, 1941. Radio logs of KGMB, KGU radio, Honolulu police, and Honolulu Fire Department files for December 7, 1941.

Franklin D. Roosevelt Presidential Library, Hyde Park, New York

Operated by National Archives

Archivists: William Emerson, Robert Parks, Raymond Teichman, Susan Elter, Mark Renovitch

Original daily appointment schedules of President Franklin Roosevelt and First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt: the Usher Books chronicle the daily White House schedules; “Trips of the President,” Diary and Itineraries detail his travel schedules, including names and affiliations of accompanying staff and news media. Both logs run continuously from March 1932 to the President’s death in April 1945.

The Diary of Adolf A. Berle, Jr.

The photographic collection, originated by press services and volunteers. Roosevelt did not have an official White House photographer.

Oral History Program: Vice Admiral Walter S. Anderson.

Oral History Program:

Reminiscences of Real Admiral Arthur H. McCollum

Reminiscences of Real Admiral Charles Adair

Reminiscences of Captain Joseph J. Rochefort

Reminiscences of Captain Thomas Dyer

Federal Bureau of Investigation

There is no all-inclusive file. The author obtained portions of 61 FBI files concerning Japanese espionage by filing FOIA requests with the FBI's Freedom of Information Section in Washington, DC. In reply he received photocopies that were riddled with blackouts and censorship by the Bureau. In an attempt to override the blackouts and censorship, appeals were made to the Department of Justice, Attorney General Janet Reno and her public relations staff headed by Carl Stern, former US Supreme Court news reporter for NBC-TV. Except for minor variances, none of my appeals were granted. The 61 FBI file numbers are:

40-0	State Department visa file pertaining to Japanese diplomats in the United States, 1940–41 era.
61-4	Espionage at Japanese consulate, Honolulu; reports by special agent Frederick Tillman on Tadashi Morimura. Hoover alerts to FBI field offices.
61-5381	Unknown subject. Released to author based on FOIA inquiry concerning Tadashi Morimura and the Nitta Maru . But the so-called “released” pages are heavily censored and blacked out as a B-1 National Defense Secret.
61-7632	Transporation of obscene matter involving Nitta Maru .
61-10556	Japanese espionage, Honolulu; messages of Hoover to Berle. Some documents censored as B-1 National Defense Secrets.
62-33413	Possibly intercepts of Japanese COMINT involving espionage and subversive activities. Some Hoover-Anderson correspondence. Heavily censored.
62-60950	Involves 1941 reports of the Japanese liner Taiyo Maru , Honolulu and internal security of the United States.
62-66721	Complaints by the Japanese government concerning American treatment of consulate members who were moved from Hawaii to Dragoon, Arizona, in 1942.
65-0	Post-attack investigations of Japanese spy Tadashi Morimura.
65-2	Japanese espionage at Honolulu consulate.
65-286	Possible coded messages involving Nitta Maru . Not released.
65-414	Main espionage file on the Japanese consulate in Honolulu; includes wiretap file.

65-492	Not obtained. FOIA request not granted.
65-552	Unable to identify. Heavily censored as a B-1 National Defense Secret.
65-560	Japanese espionage suspects.
65-639	Japanese activities, Honolulu, 1941. Super secret file. No numbers or references assigned. Identification of Tadashi Morimura, but specific dates have been censored.
65-1574	German spy in Hawaii Otto Kuehn and his links to Japanese consulate.
65-1628	Tadashi Morimura espionage in Honolulu.
65-1841	Japanese espionage in Honolulu.
65-1843	Japanese espionage re Nitta Maru .
65-4374	Ordered from FBI by FOIA request. Not released to author.
65-5413	Espionage re Nitta Maru . Not released.
65-7267	Hoover alerts to Berle by special messenger. Involves the Nitta Maru , the liner that transported Morimura to Honolulu in March 1941. Heavily censored.
65-8946	Honolulu espionage file concerning Nitta Maru , April 1941. FOIA request filed but no part released.
65-9180	Honolulu espionage file involves Germany. Hoover alerts to Berle concerning Japan.
65-9748	Japanese espionage and activities in Hawaii, Washington, DC. Involves surveillance of Japanese Diet members while on visits to United States.
65-9873	Espionage file re Nitta Maru . October 1940.
65-10325	Special messages involving espionage reports from Hoover to Berle, 1940-41. Honolulu FBI field office reports from Robert Shivers.

- 65-10556 Extensive 1940–41 file on reports of Japanese espionage throughout United States. Involves Japanese consulate in Honolulu, Acting Consul-General Otojiro Okuda, and Secretary Kokichi Seki.
- 65-24238 Espionage file involving Nitta Maru, New York, San Francisco.
- 65-26112 Internal security re German espionage, with links to Nitta Maru and New York.
- 65-26142 Re: Nitta Maru and links to Atlanta, Georgia. Heavily censored.
- 65-26143 Re: Nitta Maru.
- 65-27565 Protection of Japanese consulate, Honolulu; espionage.
- 65-30500 Re: Nitta Maru. SAC Shivers' radiograms to Hoover sent via Navy radio facilities. Extraordinary FBI censorship blacks out dates, file numbers, and the text of documents as B-1 National Defense Secrets. Attorney General Janet Reno refused to declassify this file.
- 65-33780 Unable to identify the file subject due to FBI censorship.
- 65-36120 Cryptographic file involving Japanese espionage; contains intercepts. Some sent to Major General Edwin "Pa" Watson and marked as "Of interest to the President."
- 65-36220 Departure of Japanese consulate members from New York on SS Gripsholm, July–August 1942.
- 65-37803 1941–42 file. Japanese activities in Chicago, New Orleans. Wiretaps. Involves link to Assistant Secretary of State Adolf Berle, Jr. Entire file heavily censored.

65-39168	Japanese espionage. File never received by author.
65-41886	Japanese espionage file contains post-attack reports on Richard Kotoshirodo and Tadashi Morimura.
65-42398	Japanese espionage, Honolulu. 1942 FBI reports sent to Assistant Secretary of State Adolf Berle, Jr.
65-55473	A 1945 report of espionage with focus on German suspects and Japan, involving Nitta Maru .
66-03	FBI Bulletin file, 1941.
66-656	Intelligence Conferences with Hoover and military intelligence officials.
66-8603	Intelligence Conferences documents withheld as B-1 National Defense Secrets.
94-4	FBI surveillance in 1961 involving Morimura/Yoshikawa, Walter Cronkite, and CBS-TV news.
97-274	Japanese espionage, Honolulu.
100-0	Appears to be a special file on Morimura/Yoshikawa. Not released to author.
100-2	Japanese espionage in Honolulu.
100-97	Post-attack intelligence assessments by FBI dated after 1946. Confirms US Navy broke Japanese military codes prior to December 7, 1941. Contains Japanese diplomatic intercepts.
100-185	Espionage investigations of 1942 involving Kotoshirodo and Morimura.
100-687	Japanese espionage file for Honolulu. No details.
100-832	German espionage suspects en route from New York to San Francisco to board Nitta Maru in August 1940.
100-1387	Japanese espionage in pre-Pearl Harbor Honolulu area, 1943 reports.
100-2643	Japanese espionage pre Pearl Harbor, 1943 reports by US Army.
100-62229	FBI file on Nagao Kita, Japanese consul-general, Honolulu, 1941.
100-65558	Unknown. Not received by author.
100-111258	1942 files on Japanese espionage concerning pre Pearl Harbor.
100-141295	1943 era. Involves FBI agent Fred Tillman attempting to locate consulate clerk Richard Kotoshirodo and taxi driver John Mikami for trial.
190-152	Involves espionage activities at Honolulu Consulate. Not released to author.

Interviews and Personal Correspondence with the Author

I wish to acknowledge the enthusiastic assistance of the many dedicated US Navy intercept operators and cryptographers who, through letters or personal interviews, patiently explained their highly secret methods of tracking the Japanese naval units prior to December 7, 1941.

Station AE, Sitka, Alaska

Fred R. Thomson, Radioman-in-charge (Letters 1986–88).

Station M, Cheltenham, Maryland

Ralph Briggs, Navy intercept operator, interviewed by the author, Reno, Nevada, August 27, 1987.

Station King, Dutch Harbor, Territory of Alaska

Thomas E. Gilmore of Tacoma, Washington, RDF operator; letter of December 3, 1985.
Frank W. Hess of Chula Vista, California, RDF operator; letter of January 6, 1986.
Harry Hood of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. RDF operator; letter of January 15, 1986.

Station CAST, Corregidor Island, Philippines

Duane L. Whitlock, traffic analyst. Taped audio interview with author, September 30, 1993, Danville, California; author-Whitlock telephone conversations and correspondence January–May 1999, Strawberry Point, Iowa.

Robert Dowd of Oakdale, California, Navy yeoman and Purple machine operator in 1941. Oakdale, California. Telephone and written correspondence with the author April–May 1999.

Station H, Heeia, Hawaii

Homer Kisner of Carlsbad, California, radio traffic chief. Author-taped audio interviews April 22, 23, 1988, Carlsbad, California. Videotaped interview Best Western Hotel, Sacramento, California, April 24, 1998. Extensive written correspondence between author and Kisner, 1988–1999.

Jerry Randle, intercept operator. Taped audio interview, Reno, Nevada, August 27, 1987.

Jack Kaye of Santa Ana, California, Navy intercept operator. Written correspondence and e-mail, April–May 1999.

Maynard Albertson of Spring Valley, California, Navy intercept operator. Written correspondence, April 1999.

Henry Garstka, of Edgewater, New Jersey, Navy intercept and RDF operator. Telephone conversation May 7, 1999.

Roy Lehman of Hawthorne, California, Navy intercept operator. Written correspondence with author, March 20, 1986, May 5, 1986. Taped audio interview, Hawthorne, California, December 2, 1987.

Elliott Okins of Chula Vista, California, Navy intercept supervisor. Written correspondence with author, June 7 and 20, 1986.

Donovan Chase, Santa Rosa, California, Navy intercept operator. Taped audio interview, January 15, 1988.

Hugh McGall of Magalia, California, Navy intercept operator. Written correspondence May 8 and September 2, 1986.

Joseph Christie Howard of Kent, Washington. Written correspondence and telephone interviews, May, June 1999.

Station HYPO, Administration Building, Fourteenth Naval District, Pearl Harbor Naval Yard, Hawaii

Rear Admiral Edwin Layton of Carmel, California, intelligence officer for the Pacific Fleet. Not an official part of HYPO, but spent considerable time with Rochefort and staff. Interviewed by the author November 29, 1982; written correspondence 1982–83.

Captain Thomas Dyer of Sykesville, Maryland, second in command and head of the cryptographic section. Written correspondence 1983.

Captain Forrest Biard of Long Beach, California, Japanese language officer, reported to Station HYPO November 1941. Taped audio interview at Long Beach, California, December 1, 1987, and subsequent written correspondence 1988; additional interview during visit to Midway Battle Symposium, Pensacola, Florida, April 1988.

Arnold Conant of Dunnellon, Florida, Chief Yeoman and cryptographer assistant to Dyer. Written correspondence May 4, 1986.

Durwood Rorie of Winter Springs, Florida, Chief Yeoman and head of physical security of the Station HYPO office. Written correspondence March 24, April 20, and May 23, 1986.

Irving Morris of Emeryville, California, yeoman in the ship movement section; interviewed at Emeryville, California, January 1993.

Captain Wilfred J. Holmes of Honolulu, Hawaii, ship movement section. Taped audio interview and correspondence, 1982–83.

I wish to acknowledge the utmost courtesy of Mrs. Janet Rochefort Elerding, daughter of Commander Joseph Rochefort, the commanding officer of Station HYPO, during my visit to Santa Ana, California, November 18, 1982.

Other Sources

I had the good fortune to benefit from the expertise of the following: William Seale, an architect-historian who provided details on the Roosevelt White House; Pulitzer Prize-winning historian John Toland and his wife Toshiko; Commander Sado Seno of the Imperial Japanese Navy; the late Michi Weglen, an author and a victim of the Japanese Internment of 1942; author James Rusbridger; Lee S. Motteler, geographer, Honolulu; Ed Aber-Song, who served with US Navy Public Affairs in 1982; Donald Cleff, Chief Engineer City, and County of Honolulu, for maps of the Territorial Planning Board, 1939–41 era; Bertha Ihnat, Ohio State University at Columbus, and Kendrick D. McNulty of the Daily News-Record, Harrisonburg, Virginia, for details on Agnes Meyer Driscoll; and Bernard K. Zobrist, Director of the Harry S. Truman Library. Though I didn't always get what I asked for, personnel at the Naval Security Group Command at Washington, DC, at least tried: Christopher Gentile, Robert Sheer, Peg Feightner, Commander Irv Newman, the late George Henriksen, and Lieutenant Brian L. Blankenship. Grady Lewis, editor of Cryptolog, the official publication of the Naval Cryptologic Veterans Association, was gracious with his time and steered me to the Navy intercept operators. Carol Leadenham, Reference Archivist at the Hoover Institution Archives, Stanford University, Stanford, California, shared her extensive knowledge of the papers of Lieutenant General Walter Short. Captain Thomas Kimmel, his brother Edward, Husband E. Kimmel II and Thomas Kimmel Jr., grandsons of the admiral, shared their information. Jane Sween of the Montgomery County Historical Society, Rockville, Maryland; Richard Harnett, former United Press Bureau Chief in San Francisco; and Stephen A. Haller, Historian of the National Parks Service at the San Francisco Presidio, provided information on Station TWO. Dr. P. C. van Royen, Director of the Institute for Maritime History in the Netherlands, furnished details on Captain Johan Ranneft. Alma de Bisschop checked Dutch history records in Amsterdam and confirmed Dutch translations, as did the Dutch Consulate General in San Francisco. Paul Dane of the Society of Wireless Pioneers provided invaluable insights into the International Morse Code and its difference from Japanese radiotelegraphy. Marge Stromgren of Kaneohe, Hawaii, spent years tracing the records of Station H in the Kaneohe Library and took aerial photographs of the site.

Lieutenant Commander Cedric Brown of the Royal Navy corresponded with the author in 1985–86 and confirmed that a British cryptographic unit known as the Q Team intercepted Japanese communications on Stonecutter's Island in Hong Kong Harbor in 1941. William vanden Heuvel confirmed his diary report concerning William Donovan. Judges Vernon Moore and Robert Hughes gave me their legal insights on Arthur McCollum's provocative actions. Lynn Suter shared her knowledge of Navy–Congress relations.

Sean and Naemi McPherson served as the main Japanese translators for this book. I received additional translation input from Kimi and George Matsumoto, Kiyoko Yamada, and Gabriel Sylvian. I am indebted to Casey Murrow, son of Edward R. Murrow. In Oregon, Ann Witty of the Columbia River Maritime Museum and Dr. Charles F. Cardinell of the Oregon Maritime Center helped to locate the Bar Pilot records involving the Russian vessel Uritski. Daniel J. Lenihan, Chief of the Submerged Cultural Resource Unit of the National Parks Service, and his talented staff of divers and historians, detailed for me the damage to the USS Arizona. My thanks go to David Lotz and Bill Stewart of the War in the Pacific National Park on Guam. David Aiken shared many of his Japanese records. Max Bishop and H. Merrill Benninghoff, members of the 1941 American Embassy in Tokyo, shared their pre-Pearl Harbor experiences. Professor John Moore of California Polytechnic College, Pomona, supplied information on CBS radio newsman Cecil Brown.

The never-ending research involving Pearl Harbor began in 1982 and continues in 1999. It has taken a long time, and many people and organizations have helped me. If I have omitted your name it is an oversight and I apologize. I could not have written this book without the help of each and every one of you.

Special Acknowledgments

My wife Peggy, associate editor of the Oakland Tribune, who helped with professional guidance and insight along the long journey of getting this book done. She and my children kept my spirits up, Coleen and Dennis Badagliacco, Jim Stinnett, and grandchildren Robert and Laura Badagliacco have never wavered in their support of this project even though they often chorused: “When Will the Book Be Done?”

The Book Be Done people have been miraculous: Michael Larsen and Elizabeth Pomada, my literary agents, who believed in my project from the start; James O. Wade skillfully edited and guided the first manuscript drafts; Bruce Nichols, Senior Editor, Dan Freedberg, Carol de Onís, and Camilla Hewitt of The Free Press edited the final drafts and cleared the way for publication with warmth, humor, and enthusiasm. Their suggestions helped open up the manuscript for readers and guided me in explaining and simplifying the intricacies of code-breaking. For typing the manuscript there are no acknowledgments. I did it myself thanks to the two Steves, Jobs and Wozniak. Their Apple saw me through.

Any complaints concerning the book and my research must fall on me alone.

A SERIES OF WAR WARNINGS ISSUED BY THE US GOVERNMENT

~~TOP SECRET~~

Prediction of a Japanese “surprise aggressive movement in any direction” came from Rear Admiral Royal Ingersoll, assistant chief of naval operations, on November 24, 1941. Upon receiving this message on the super secret US Navy CETYH circuit (see lower right), Admiral Husband E. Kimmel pulled the Pacific Fleet out of a North Pacific reconnaissance mission.

HEADQUARTERS HAWAIIAN DEPARTMENT
FORT SHAFTER, T. H.

MEMORANDUM FOR DEPARTMENT ADJUTANT GENERAL

Request that the following SECRET official radiogram be sent. This message does NOT cover subject matter previously sent in a message, either in the clear or having a different security classification.

This message is *Priority
*URGENT
*SECRET

*Strike out words not applicable.

Sent as Radiogram No.	Message Center No.	Time Filed	Check	Code Clerk
PL WAR PRTY MARSH DC 611 PM NOV 27 1941			Approved for Transmission:
CG HAWN DEPT FT SHAFTER TH			Adjutant General

472 27TH NEGOTIATIONS WITH JAPAN APPEAR TO BE TERMINATED TO ALL PRACTICAL PURPOSES WITH ONLY THE BARREST POSSIBILITIES THAT THE JAPANESE GOVERNMENT MIGHT COME BACK AND OFFER TO CONTINUE STOP JAPANESE FUTURE ACTION UNPREDICTABLE BUT HOSTILE ACTION POSSIBLE AT ANY MOMENT STOP IF HOSTILITIES CANNOT COMMA REPEAT CANNOT COMMA BE AVOIDED THE UNITED STATES DESIRES THAT JAPAN COMMIT THE FIRST OVERT ACT STOP THIS POLICY SHOULD NOT COMMA REPEAT NOT COMMA BE CONSTRUED AS RESTRICTING YOU TO A COURSE OF ACTION THAT MIGHT JEOPARDIZE YOUR DEFENSE STOP PRIOR TO HOSTILE JAPANESE ACTION YOU ARE DIRECTED TO UNDERTAKE SUCH RECONNAISSANCE AND OTHER MEASURES AS YOU DEEM NECESSARY BUT THESE MEASURES SHOULD BE CARRIED OUT SO AS NOT COMMA REPEAT NOT COMMA TO ALARM CIVIL POPULATION OR DISCLOSE INTENT STOP REPORT MEASURES TAKEN STOP SHOULD HOSTILITIES OCCUR YOU WILL CARRY OUT THE TASKS ASSIGNED IN RAINBOW FIVE SO FAR AS THEY PERTAIN TO JAPAN STOP LIMIT DISSEMINATION OF THIS HIGHLY SECRET INFORMATION TO MINIMUM ESSENTIAL OFFICERS

TRUE COPY
O.M. Cutler
O M CUTLER
LT COL INFANTRY

MARSHALL
1162/27

NOTE: This form to be used only for Radiograms and Cables. One copy only to be submitted. The making of an exact copy of Secret or Confidential Radiograms is forbidden. Only such extracts as are absolutely necessary will be made and marked secret or confidential as the case may be. This copy will be safeguarded with the greatest care and when no longer required will be returned to the Records Division, Adjutant General's Office, without delay. (AR 380-2)

Form 8-2, No. 217 (Revised) - 1941 Rev. 10-10-40 186

Source: General Short's papers, Hoover Institution Archives, Stanford University, Stanford, California.

Though it is signed "MARSHALL," this November 27, 1941, war warning message was originated by Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, acting on the orders of President Roosevelt. It directs the Hawaiian US Army commander, Lieutenant General Walter Short, to follow an official US government desire: "The United States desires that Japan commit the first overt act."

NAVAL MESSAGE		NAVY DEPARTMENT		MESSAGE PRECEDENCE
PHONE EXTENSION NUMBER	0912 Ext. 2902	ADDRESSEES
FROM Chief of Naval Operations		CINCPAC		PRIORITY X
RELEASED BY [Signature]		CINCPAC		ROUTINE
DATE November 27, 1941				DEFERRED
FOR COPIES		INFORMATION
RECORDED BY		CINCPAC		PRIORITY
PARAPHRASED BY		SP7AVO		ROUTINE
				DEFERRED

INDICATE BY ASTERISK ADDRESSEES FOR WHICH MAIL DELIVERY IS SATISFACTORY

GKVLW BVKLW 272337 09471

UNLESS OTHERWISE DESIGNATED THIS DESPATCH WILL BE TRANSMITTED WITH DEFERRED PRECEDENCE.

ORIGINATOR FILL IN DATE AND TIME FOR DEFERRED MAIL DELIVERY

DATE TIME OCT

NEWS

MM THIS DESPATCH IS TO BE CONSIDERED A WAR WARNING X NEGOTIATIONS WITH JAPAN LOOKING TOWARD STABILIZATION OF CONDITIONS IN THE PACIFIC HAVE CEASED AND AN AGGRESSIVE MOVE BY JAPAN IS EXPECTED WITHIN THE NEXT FEW DAYS X THE NUMBER AND EQUIPMENT OF JAPANESE TROOPS AND THE ORGANIZATION OF NAVAL TASK FORCES INDICATES AN AMBIVIOUS EXPEDITION ~~probably~~ AGAINST EITHER THE PHILIPPINES OR SOA PONTIOLA OR POSSIBLY BORNEO X EXERCISE AN APPROPRIATE DEFENSIVE DEPLOYMENT PREPARATORY TO CARRYING OUT THE TASKS ASSIGNED IN WPLAEX INFORM DISTRICT AND ARMY AUTHORITIES X A SIMILAR WARNING IS BEING SENT BY WAR DEPARTMENT X SPENAVO INFORM BRITISH CONTINENTAL DISTRICTS COM SEASIDE for take appropriate measures against subversive and phoned calls

CGF TO UPD AND DEPT

BY EAB
ELM-35

SEE [Signature]

The US Navy's war warning message of November 27, 1941, authored by Rear Admiral Royal Ingersoll (top left), omitted the crucial orders of President Roosevelt that called for US military forces to let Japan commit the first overt act. The omission was corrected the next day.

On Friday, November 28, 1941, Admiral Harold Stark, the chief of naval operations, restored the previous day's omission by twice repeating that the United States desired that Japan commit the first overt act.

~~TOP SECRET~~

EXCLUDED TO BE AN ADMINISTRATIVE MESSAGE
By OP 30 NOV 29 1941

NAVAL MESSAGE		NAVY MESSAGE
FROM	TO	ADDRESS	PRIORITY
FROM: Chief of Naval Operations	TO: CMCN	CMC	PRIORITY
RELEASED BY:	DATE: November 20, 1941	CMC	ROUTINE
FOR CDR/COM:	RECORDED BY:	CINCPAC	DEFERRED
FORWARDED BY:		CMC	PRIORITY
			ROUTINE
			DEFERRED

INDICATE BY ASTERISK ADDRESSEES FOR WHICH MAIL DELIVERY IS SATISFACTORY

790110

UNLESS OTHERWISE DESIGNATED THIS DISPATCH WILL BE TRANSMITTED WITH DEFERRED PRECEDENCE

ORIGINATOR	DATE	TIME	SEC.
TEXT

CONT'D (Page two)

ACTIVITIES IN UNITED STATES X SHOULD HOSTILITIES OCCUR YOU WILL CARRY OUT THE TASKS ASSIGNED IN RAINBOW FIVE SO FAR AS THEY PERTAIN TO JAPAN X LIMIT DISSEMINATION OF THIS HIGHLY SECRET INFORMATION TO MINIMUM ESSENTIAL OFFICERS X UNQUOTE XX WPLAS IS NOT APPLICABLE TO PACIFIC AREA AND WILL NOT BE PLACED IN EFFECT IN THAT AREA
EXCEPT AS NOW IN FORCE IN SOUTHEAST PACIFIC SUB AREA AND PANAMA
NAVAL COASTAL FRONTIER X UNDERTAKE NO OFFENSIVE ACTION UNTIL JAPAN HAS COMMITTED AN OVERT ACT X BE PREPARED TO CARRY OUT TASKS ASSIGNED IN WPLAS SO FAR AS THEY APPLY TO JAPAN X CASE HOSTILITIES OCCUR XX

~~TOP SECRET~~

~~SECRET~~

(page two of two)

MAKE ORIGINAL ONLY DELIVER TO COMMUNICATION WATCH OFFICER IN PERSON

SEE ART 76 (4)
NAV REGS

E1MUG
ECM 25

HEADQUARTERS HAWAIIAN DEPARTMENT
FORT SHAFTER, T. H.

MEMORANDUM FOR DEPARTMENT ADJUTANT GENERAL:

Request that the following ~~SECRET~~ ~~CONFIDENTIAL~~ ~~REMARKS~~ official radiogram be sent. This message does NOT cover subject matter previously sent in a message, either in the clear or having a different security classification.

This message is ~~Priority~~ ~~SECRET~~ ~~CONFIDENTIAL~~

*Strike out words not applicable.

Signature and Title

Sent as Radiogram No.	Message Center No.	Time Filed	Check	Code Clerk
114 WAR KR 169 WD PRIT
WASH DC 842P NOV 28 1941			Approved for Transmission:
C G			Adjutant General

HAW DEPT FT SHAFTER T H

462 28TH CRITICAL SITUATION DEMANDS THAT ALL PRECAUTIONS BE TAKEN IMMEDIATELY AGAINST SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES WITHIN FIELD OF INVESTIGATIVE RESPONSIBILITY OF WAR DEPARTMENT PAREN SEE PARAGRAPH THREE MID 30 THIRTY DASH FORTY FIVE END PAREN STOP ALSO DESIRED THAT YOU INITIATE FORTHWITH ALL ADDITIONAL MEASURES NECESSARY TO PROVIDE FOR PROTECTION OF YOUR ESTABLISHMENTS COMMA PROPERTY COMMA AND EQUIPMENT AGAINST SABOTAGE COMMA PROTECTION OF YOUR PERSONNEL AGAINST SUBVERSIVE PROPAGANDA AND PROTECTION OF ALL ACTIVITIES AGAINST ESPIONAGE STOP THIS DOES NOT REPEAT NOT MEAN THAT ANY ILLEGAL MEASURES ARE AUTHORIZED STOP PROTECTIVE MEASURES SHOULD BE CONFINED TO THOSE ESSENTIAL TO SECURITY COMMA AVOIDING UNNECESSARY PUBLICITY AND ALARM STOP TO INSURE SPEED OF TRANSMISSION IDENTICAL TELEGRAMS ARE BEING SENT TO ALL AIR STATIONS BUT THIS DOES NOT REPEAT NOT AFFECT YOUR RESPONSIBILITY UNDER EXISTING INSTRUCTIONS

ADAMS

THIS COPY
O M CUTLER
LT COL INFANTRY

NOTE: This form to be used only for Radiograms and Cablegrams. One copy only to be submitted. The making of an exact copy of Secret or Confidential Radiograms is forbidden. Only such extracts as are absolutely necessary will be made and marked secret or confidential as the case may be. This copy will be safeguarded with the greatest care and when no longer required will be returned to the Records Division, Adjutant General's Office, without delay. (AR 880-6)

Form H.R. No. 1173 (Revised)—1941 Replaces 10-15-40 886.

Source: Papers of Lt. Gen. Walter Short, Hoover Institution Archives, Stanford University, Stanford, CA.

A second warning to prepare for subversive activities and sabotage in Hawaii was issued to Lieutenant General Walter Short by the US Army Adjutant General, Emory Adams, on Friday, November 28, 1941. Adams warned Short not to precipitate publicity or alarm.

HEADQUARTERS HAWAIIAN DEPARTMENT
FORT SHAFTER, T. H.

MEMORANDUM FOR DEPARTMENT ADJUTANT GENERAL:

Request that the following ~~SECRET~~ ~~CONFIDENTIAL~~ ~~REMARKS~~ official radiogram be sent. This message does NOT cover subject matter previously sent in a message, either in the clear or having a different security classification.

This message is ~~Priority~~ ~~SECRET~~ ~~CONFIDENTIAL~~

*Strike out words not applicable.

Signature and Title

Sent as Radiogram No.	Message Center No.	Time Filed	Check	Code Clerk
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL WAR DEPARTMENT WASHINGTON D C
			Approved for Transmission:
			Adjutant General

RE YOUR SECRET RADIO FOUR EIGHT TWO TWENTY EIGHT COMMA FULL PRECAUTIONS ARE BEING TAKEN AGAINST SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES WITHIN THE FIELD OF INVESTIGATIVE RESPONSIBILITY OF WAR DEPARTMENT PAREN PARAGRAPH THREE MID 30 THIRTY DASH FORTY FIVE END PAREN AND MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS INCLUDING PERSONNEL AND EQUIPMENT STOP AS REGARDS PROTECTION OF VITAL INSTALLATIONS OUTSIDE OF MILITARY RESERVATIONS SUCH AS POWER PLANTS COMMA TELEPHONE EXCHANGES AND HIGHWAY BRIDGES COMMA THIS HEADQUARTERS BY CONFIDENTIAL LETTER DATED JUNE NINETEEN NINETEEN FORTY ONE REQUESTED THE GOVERNOR OF THE TERRITORY TO USE THE BROAD POWERS VESTED IN HIM BY SECTION SIXTY SEVEN OF THE ORGANIC ACT WHICH PROVIDES COMMA IN EFFECT COMMA THAT THE GOVERNOR MAY CALL UPON THE COMMANDERS OF MILITARY AND NAVAL FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII TO PREVENT OR SUPPRESS LAWLESS VIOLENCE COMMA INVASION COMMA INSURRECTION ETC STOP PURSUANT TO THE AUTHORITY STATED THE GOVERNOR ON JUNE TWENTYNINTH CONFIDENTIALLY MADE A FORMAL WRITTEN DEMAND ON THIS HEADQUARTERS TO FURNISH AND CONTINUE TO FURNISH SUCH ADEQUATE PROTECTION AS MAY BE NECESSARY TO PREVENT SABOTAGE COMMA AND LAWLESS VIOLENCE IN CONNECTION THEREWITH COMMA BEING COMMITTED AGAINST VITAL INSTALLATIONS AND STRUCTURES IN THE TERRITORY STOP PURSUANT TO THE FOREGOING REQUEST APPROPRIATE

NOTE: This form to be used only for Radiograms and Cablegrams. One copy only to be submitted. The making of an exact copy of Secret or Confidential Radiograms is forbidden. Only such extracts as are absolutely necessary will be made and marked secret or confidential as the case may be. This copy will be safeguarded with the greatest care and when no longer required will be returned to the Records Division, Adjutant General's Office, without delay. (AR 880-6)

Form H.R. No. 1173 (Revised)—1941 Replaces 10-15-40 886.

Source: Walter Short papers, Hoover Institution Archives, Stanford University, Stanford, CA.

General Short issued this reply to the three US Army war warnings sent him from Washing ton. Since two of the directives warned him to anticipate subversive and sabotage activities,Short followed orders.

HEADQUARTERS HAWAIIAN DEPARTMENT
FORT SHAFTER, T. H.

MEMORANDUM FOR DEPARTMENT ADJUTANT GENERAL (Info)

Request that the following

*Secret
*Confidential
*Restricted

official radiogram be sent. This message does NOT cover subject matter previously sent in a message, unless in the clear or having a different security classification.

This message is
*Priority
*Routine
*Deferred

*Strike out words not applicable

Signature and Title

Sent as Radiogram No.	Message Center No.	Time Filed	Check	Code Clerk
-----------------------	--------------------	------------	-------	------------

PAGE TWO

Approved for Transmission:

Adjutant General

MILITARY PROTECTION IS NOW BEING AFFORDED VITAL CIVILIAN INSTALLATIONS STOP IN THIS CONNECTION CUMMA AT THE INSTIGATION OF THIS HEADQUARTERS THE CITY AND COUNTY OF HONOLULU ON JUNE THIRTIETH NINETEEN FORTY ONE ENACTED AN ORDINANCE WHICH PERMITS
THE COMMANDING GENERAL HAWAIIAN DEPARTMENT CUMMA TO CLOSE CUMMA OR RESTRICT THE USE OF AND TRAVE, UPON CUMMA ANY HIGHWAY WITHIN THE CITY AND COUNTY OF HONOLULU CUMMA WHEREBY THE COMMANDING GENERAL STANDS DOWN ACTION NECESSARY IN THE INTEREST OF NATIONAL DEFENSE STOP THE AUTHORITY THUS GIVEN HAS NOT YET BEEN EXERCISED STOP RELATIONS WITH F W I AND ALL OTHER FEDERAL AND TERRITORIAL OFFICIALS ARE BEING MAINTAINED ON A BASIS OF MUTUAL COOPERATION HAS BEEN GIVEN ON ALL PERTINENT MATTERS

END
END
BY LT COL BRUNSWICK BG
2:45 P M NOV 41

THIS COPY
BY
O W DUTLER
LT COL INFAN 2MT

NOTE: This form to be used only for radiograms and cablegrams. One copy only to be submitted. The sending or encasing of Secret or Confidential radiograms is necessary. Every such message so encased is necessary with care and marked secret or confidential as the case may be. This copy will be safeguarded with the greatest care and the original required will be returned to the Records Division, Adjutant General's Office, without delay. (Ah see instructions for filing and handling of messages)

NO. 71008
By: MAF MAJ Gen 520

p 9 J RADIOGRAM 0-4-c

605P
Received at the War Department Message Center
Room 344 Munitions Bldg., Washington, D. C.

P R I O R I T Y NOVEMBER 28, 1941 557A M.

From: FORT SHAFTER TH

To: CHIEF OF STAFF

Copies furnished as noted:

NO. 959 NOVEMBER 27TH
REPORT DEPARTMENT ALERTED TO PREVENT SABOTAGE PARICD LIAISON WITH NAVY BUREAU FOUR SEVEN TWO TWENTY SEVENTH SHORT

Notes: HNS
S. (in en)
NOTED - CHIEF OF STAFF
W. W. D. R. 19

46 A 60
DEC 8 1941
Received

NOV 28 1941

Action Copy

R. 12 14 1941

P. 12 14 1941

DECLASSIFIED
Authority NND 710058
By MAF MAFR Date 5-22-88

PO 14
325P

CABLEGRAM

Received at the War Department Message Center
Room 3441 Munitions Bldg., Washington, D. C.

NOVEMBER 28, 1941

453A AF

From MANILA PI
To GENERAL GEORGE C MARSHALL

SECRET

Copies furnished as noted:

NO. 1004, NOVEMBER TWENTY EIGHTH
PURSUANT TO INSTRUCTIONS CONTAINED IN YOUR RADIO SIX TWO FOUR AIR RECONNAISSANCE HAS BEEN EXTENDED AND INTENSIFIED IN CONJUNCTION WITH THE NAVY STOP GROUND SECURITY MEASURES HAVE BEEN TAKEN STOP WITHIN THE LIMITATIONS IMPOSED BY PRESENT STATE OF DEVELOPMENT OF THIS THEATRE OF OPERATIONS EVERYTHING IS IN READINESS FOR THE CONDUCT OF A SUCCESSFUL DEFENSE STOP INTIMATE LIAISON AND COOPERATION AND CORDIAL RELATIONS EXIST BETWEEN ARMY AND NAVY

MACARTHUR
48 A 50
DEC 3 '41
Received

*Noting Hqs
(15 Dec 1941)*

NOTED - CHIEF OF STAFF
NOTED, WFO RLB

SECRET

Action Copy

.../1813/18
P. 4. 470/11

(14-88-11) 60 381 (11-28-41)

Source: RG80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II.

General Douglas MacArthur assured Washington that he was not about to conduct offensive operations against Japan from his US Army command post in Manila. His reply to let Japan commit the first overt act was just what was desired by the White House: "Everything is in readiness for the conduct of a successful defense."

SECRET

12/11/41. 12-7-41

December 7, 1941.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ADJUTANT GENERAL (Through Secretary, General Staff)
Subject: Far East Situation.

The Secretary of War directs that the following first priority secret radiograms be sent to the Commanding General, U.S. Army Forces in the Far East; Commanding General, Caribbean Defense Command; Commanding General, Hawaiian Department; Commanding General, Fourth Army:

Japanese are presenting at one p.m. Eastern Standard time to what amounts to an ultimatum also they are under orders to destroy their Code machine immediately stop Just what significance the hour set may have we do not know but be on alert accordingly stop Inform naval authorities of this communication.

MARSHALL

Noted O.C.S.
12/7/41

L. T. GERRICK
Brigadier General,
Acting Assistant Chief of Staff.

Code message sent 12/7/41
Radios as follows dispatched 11:52 AM, 12-7-41,
by Code Room, WDC:
1206' #733 to CG, USAFFE, Manila, P.I.;
1217' #529 to CG, Haw. Dept., Ft. Shafter, HI.
1200' #529 to CG, Crbn. Def. Cmd., Quarry Heights, CA.
1211' #16 to CG, Fourth Army, Pres. of San Fro., Cal.
ahb - 1705.

SECRET

JAN - 3 1942

Source: RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II.

Hawaii was last on the US Army list to receive this warning that Japan had set a Washington, DC, deadline of 1 P.M., Sunday, December 7, 1941. The time corresponded to 7:30 A.M. Sunday December 7, 1941, in Hawaii—less than 30 minutes to the first Japanese bomb drop. This message did not reach Lieutenant General Walter Short until mid-afternoon, Sunday December 7, 1941, about 6 hours after the first bombs fell on Pearl Harbor.

SELECTED INTELLIGENCE DOCUMENTS, 1940-41

25 November 1941

From: CinC Combined Fleet
To: First Air Fleet
(Pearl Harbor Attack Force)

The task force, keeping its movement strictly secret and maintaining close guard against submarines and aircraft, shall advance into Hawaiian waters, and upon the very opening of hostilities shall attack the main force of the United States Fleet in Hawaii and deal it a mortal blow. The first air raid is planned for the dawn of X-day (exact date to be given by later order). Upon completion of the air raid, the task force, keeping close coordination and guarding against the enemy's counterattack, shall speedily leave the enemy waters and then return to Japan.

Should the negotiations with the United States prove successful, the task force shall hold itself in readiness forthwith to return and reassemble.

Source: See Vice Admiral Homer N. Wallin, Pearl Harbor (Naval History Division, US Government Printing Office, 1968), p. 86. For a similar dispatch see United States Strategic Bombing Survey (Pacific) Naval Analysis Division, The Campaigns of the Pacific War, US Government Printing Office, 1946), p. 50.

This message, stripped of all communications data but following the form of the US Navy's intercept messages, was published in 1968 in a book written by Vice Admiral Homer N. Wallin. The message is from Admiral Isoroku Yamamoto, commander-in-chief of the Imperial Japanese Navy, to Admiral Chuichi Nagumo, commander of the First Air Fleet, Japan's carrier force. It indicates that Yamamoto broke radio silence and directed Nagumo to advance into Hawaiian waters and deal the United States Fleet in Hawaii a mortal blow. Wallin writes that the date is Tokyo Time, which would correspond to November 24, 1941, in the United States. On November 24, 1941, Admiral Kimmel called off an air and seasearch for a Japanese carrier force and pulled the Pacific Fleet from the North Pacific when he was directed by Washington not to precipitate Japanese action. US Naval intercept records concerning November 24, 1941, Japanese naval dispatches have not been released.

THE CAMPAIGNS of the PACIFIC WAR

Japanese Naval Despatches Ordering Commencement of Hostilities

5 November 1941.

From: The Chief of Naval General Staff
To: CinC Combined Fleet

1. In view of the fact that it is feared war has become unavoidable with the United States, Great Britain, and the Netherlands, and for the self preservation and future existence of the Empire, the various preparations for war operations will be completed by the first part of December.
2. The CinC of the Combined Fleet will effect the required preparations for war operations.
3. Execution of details will be as directed by Chief of the Naval General Staff.

5 November 1941.

From: The Chief of Naval General Staff
To: CinC China Area Fleet

1. In view of the fact that it is feared war has become unavoidable with the United States, Great Britain, and the Netherlands, and for the self preservation and future existence of the Empire, the various preparations for war operations will be completed by the first part of December.
2. The CinC Combined Fleet will effect the required preparations for war operations in accordance with Imperial Headquarters Order, No. 1.
3. The CinC of the China Area Fleet will continue operations against China and at the same time effect required preparations for war operations.
4. Execution of details will be directed by Chief of the Naval General Staff.

Source: United States Strategic Bombing Survey, The Campaigns of the Pacific War, (USGPO, 1946), p. 49.

These two radio dispatches originated by Admiral Osami Nagano, Chief of the Japanese Navy's General Staff, appear to be the possible source of statements delivered by General George C. Marshall during a secret press briefing on November 15, 1941. In his briefing, Marshall disclosed that the United States had broken Japanese codes, predicted that America was on the brink of war with the Japanese, and expected the danger period would include the first ten days of December 1941. See Nagano's period for the war's start in paragraph 1; see further details in chapter 10 herein.

NAVY DEPARTMENT
Office of Naval Intelligence
WASHINGTON

In reply refer to No. Op-16-F-2

16 September 1940.

Memorandum for the Chief of Naval Operations

SUBJECT: Gasoline and Oil Exports to Japan.

1. Highly reliable information has been received that on 20 August 1940 the Japanese Consul General at San Francisco informed his government that in spite of the restrictions on exports of petroleum products from the United States, no difficulty had been experienced in arranging for shipments of ordinary gasoline and of crude petroleum.
2. The Consul General at San Francisco informed his government in detail as follows:
 - (a) All the details connected with applications for export permits for petroleum products are being left in the hands of American agents by the Mitsui and Mitsubishi companies of San Francisco. These American agencies from whom the oil is bought go ahead and make suitable arrangements with the government authorities at Washington.
 - (b) The Mitsubishi agency at San Francisco has been notified by the local office of the Associated Oil Company that of the applications for export permits already filed in Washington by the Associated Oil Company export licenses have been granted for about 22,000 tons of Kettleman Hill crude oil and for a similar amount of other California crude oil. This material was applied for as "special blend" crude oil.
 - (c) Considering results so far, there would appear to be no chance of securing export licenses for aviation gasoline contracted for prior to 1 August nor that export permits will be issued for this material on the basis that exports should be permitted because the companies were under contract prior to the application of the export license system.
 - (d) Recently ordinary gasoline was loaded on board vessels of the Mitsui and Mitsubishi companies in the amount of some 85,000 barrels. Permits for the export of this gasoline were granted on application for the export of ordinary freight.

-3-

Source: Station US papers, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II.

On September 16, 1940, President Roosevelt learned that Japan had found ways to evade his embargo on petroleum. Japan's consul-general in San Francisco claimed that there was no difficulty in arranging for purchase of ordinary gasoline or crude petroleum. A ton of oil equals 7.3 barrels. Though signed by Captain Walter S. Anderson, Director of the Office of Naval Intelligence, this report was originated by F-2, Commander Arthur McCollum.

-3-

(e) American oil dealers in the San Francisco area selling to Mitsui and Mitsubishi, of which the principal one is the Associated Oil Company, feel that there will be no difficulty about continuing the shipment of ordinary gasoline to Japan.

W.S. Anderson.

Original to Aide to the President.
CC - C.N.O.
M.I.B.
State
File (2) ✓
Treasury

-3-

NAVY DEPARTMENT
Office of Naval Operations
WASHINGTON
Exempt from No.
Op-16-F-2
23 February 1940.
Memorandum for the Chief of Naval Operations
SUBJECT:	Japanese Army advisors to Bolivia.
1. Highly reliable information indicates that confidential conversations are in progress between Bolivia and Japan, having for their object the sending of a Japanese Military Mission to Bolivia to serve as instructors for the Bolivian Army. It is also proposed that a number of Bolivian Army officers be sent to Japan to study in Japanese Army schools. The Japanese Army is strongly in favor of concluding an agreement with Bolivia along the above lines.
W.S. Anderson.
Original to Aide to President.
CC - C.N.O.
M.I.D.
State
File
16 F Has seen

Source: RG 38, Station US Papers, MMRB, Archives II.

The first Japanese communications intelligence documents that can be verified as routed to President Roosevelt were originated in Arthur McCollum's F-2 office and signed by Captain Walter S. Anderson, Director of Naval Intelligence, on February 23, 1940. The notation "16-F Has seen" refers to Captain W. B. Heard, who was in over all charge of ONI foreign intelligence. The term "highly reliable information" is a synonym for communications intelligence, which in this case probably refers to Japan's Tsu series of codes—or possibly to their Red machine, which predated the Purple machine. The Purple Code was solved by United States cryptographers in September 1940.

NAVY DEPARTMENT
Office of the Chief of Naval Operations
Office of NAVAL INTELLIGENCE
WASHINGTON

In reply refer to No.
Op-16-F-2

2) February 1940.

Memorandum for the Chief of Naval Operations

SUBJECT: Japanese diplomatic pressure for oil rights in Portuguese Timor.

1. Highly reliable information has been received that the Japanese have been engaged during the last year in diplomatic negotiations with Portugal to obtain for S.A.P.T., a company in Timor, the rights to drill for and produce oil on the island of Timor. The Japanese have some connection with S.A.P.T., probably through the Japanese "South Seas Development Co.," which has a branch in Timor.
2. Indications are that Portugal, under pressure from Great Britain, has granted or is about to grant monopoly rights for oil exploration in that part of the island lying east of 125° E. longitude to the Timor Petroleum Company (believed to be Australian). Previous tests by Belgian interests proved the presence of oil in this area.
3. In December the Japanese Foreign Office informed its Lisbon representative that it was important that they contest the granting of monopoly rights to the Timor Petroleum Company and get some compromise offer from Portugal.
4. The Japanese Minister at Lisbon, in January, advised the Japanese Foreign Office, "It is not only worthwhile but necessary for us, from the standpoint of national policy, to force ourselves into the scene in order to acquire rights even at the expense of straining Japanese-Portuguese relations. For this purpose, I think there is no way of solving the difficulty except by application of pressure backed by force."

S.S. Anderson.

Original to Aide to President
CC - C.N.O.
M.I.D.
State
File

16 F Has been

NAVY DEPARTMENT
OFFICE OF NAVAL INTELLIGENCE
WASHINGTON

In reply refer to No.
Op-16-F-2
776:777 (OZ-8)

8 February, 1941.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS

Subject: Reorganization and intensification of the Japanese intelligence activities in the United States.

1. A decision by the Japanese government to appreciably strengthen its espionage activities in the United States in cooperation with the Germans and Italians, is indicated by the attached memorandum which, based on highly reliable information, gives the substance of two directives dated January 30, 1941, from Foreign Minister Matsuoka to the Japanese Embassy in Washington.

 JULES JAMES,
 Captain, U.S. Navy,
 Acting Director of Naval Intelligence.

Distribution:

Naval Aide to the President	:Original.
C.N.O.	:(1)
Secretary of State	:(1)
M.I.D.	:(1)
File	:(2)

Source: Station US Papers, RG 38, Modern Military Branch, Archives II.

On February 8, 1941, Lieutenant Commander Arthur McCollum sent to President Roosevelt an intelligence report outlining Japanese plans to change from propaganda activities to espionage activities in the United States. Japan's Foreign Minister, Yosuke Matsuoka, sent the strategy to Japanese missions in the United States, writing that the policy was instituted to prepare for the worst.

From Foreign Minister Matsuo to Japanese Ambassador, Washington.
Dated January 30, 1941

Heretofore, we have placed emphasis on publicity and propaganda work in the United States. In view of the critical situation in the recent relations between the two countries, and for the purpose of being prepared for the worst, we have decided to alter this policy. Taking into consideration the small amount of funds we have at our disposal, we have decided to deemphasize propaganda for the time being, and instead, to strengthen our intelligence work.

Please, therefore, reorganize your intelligence set-up and put this new program into effect as soon as possible.

Cable copies of this message, as "Minister's orders" to Canada, Mexico, (a copy to be relayed from Mexico to Mexicali), San Francisco, (copies from San Francisco to Honolulu, Los Angeles, Portland, Seattle, and Vancouver,) New York, New Orleans, and Chicago.

1.945T

HAVE RECEIVED FROM BRITISH FOLLOWING IN A APPROXIMATE NUMBERS REFERRING TO FIVE HUNDRED SYSTEM OF EFFECTIVE DECEMBER TO FEBRUARY X FIVE HUNDRED SIX OR VALUE X FOUR THOUSAND SUBTRACTOR GROUPS X NINE THOUSAND WIRELESS INDICATOR WITH CIPHER REMOVED X AND TWO HUNDRED NINETY INDICATOR SUBTRACTORS FOR THE SAME PERI ODS X HAVE ARRANGED SECURE METHOD OF EXCHANGING FURTHER RECOVERIES BY CABLE X BRITISH EMPLOY THREE OFFICERS TWENTY CLERKS ON THIS SYSTEM ALONE X THEY ARE DELAYING ACTION ON CURRENT CIPHER TABLE UNTIL MIDNIGHT TO ACCUMULATE TRAFFIC AND OBTAIN FURTHER BOOK VALUES FROM PROCEEDING PERIOD X DUE COLLABORATION
 INFORMATION AVAILABLE HERE AND CAPABILITY RAPID EX CHANGE WITH ENGLISH CIPHER WILL ASSUME THIS SYSTEM
 AS ONLY HAVE ARRANGED X REQUEST DEPT FORWARDED RE SULTS TO DATE AND TECHNIQUE ADVANCE IF CONSIDERED N ECESSARY WPL

Sipholga var. Minle app. to man.
 on - 1000 to 200 (1000 radius) distribution - island June - 6 - 29 to transfer to

to the other about July

A major controversy concerning whether America and her Allies had solved the Japanese Navy's 5-Numeral code system prior to Pearl Harbor has been under examination by journalists and historians since the end of World War II. If the system was solved prior to the attack, then the governments of the United States, Great Britain, and the Netherlands knew the precise plans for Japan's "surprise attack." Most Radio Tokyo transmissions directing Japanese warships to attack Hawaii were sent over radio waves in the 5-Number system and intercepted by US, British, and Dutch monitoring facilities in the Pacific.

On March 5, 1941, Admiral Thomas Hart, commander-in-chief of the US Asiatic Fleet, informed Admiral Harold R. Stark, FDR's Chief of Naval Operations, that the British monitoring unit at Singapore had produced and exchanged solutions of the 5-Number code with the Asiatic Fleet. Hart said Station CAST on Cavite (he meant Corregidor) was in on the exchange and solution. A handwritten note at the middle-right asserts that OP20-A (Captain Leigh Noyes, Director of Naval Communications) on March 5, 1941, authorized the removal of this dispatch from the Navy files and the substitution of a dummy message. This dispatch was not presented to Congress during the investigations of 1945-46 or 1995. Nor was it sent to Admiral Kimmel in Hawaii.

At the bottom, a handwritten note indicates the USS Sepulga will bring United States solutions of the 5-Num code to Manila about March 26, 1941. Ensign Laurence Mac Kallor, who transported the Purple machine to CAST on the Sepulga, carried solutions to the 5-Num code as well. Apparently the reference is to the 5-Num code, additive version 6, in effect January 15, 1941, to July 1, 1941.

REPRODUCED AT THE NATIONAL ARCHIVES

DETERMINED TO BE UNCLASSIFIED ADMINISTRATIVE MAIL
E.O. 12065, Section 5-102
By 1828 WARS, Date 11/3/91

Op-30-4
Br. 948

SECRET MESSAGE
(NAVY DEPARTMENT)

From OPNAV	To COM 16
Released (Signature)	CINCPAC
Date: 23 March 1941	Chief of Staff 12/2/41
NOTE to ALL AMEMBASSIES ROUTINE to PRIORITY to

(do not write in this space)

MEACH 211500 CR
HERE TODAY (1941)

FOLLOWING PLAN FOR COORDINATION BETWEEN ASIATIC COMMUNICATION
INTELLIGENCE UNITS OF ARMY AND NAVY PROPOSED: ARMY INTERCEPT UNIT WILL HAVE DECRYPTING UNIT COPIES OF ALL INTERCEPTS IN ORANGE DIPLOMATIC SYSTEMS FORWARDING SAME BY LANDLINE OR OTHER RAPID AND SECURE MEANS TO COM 16 (FURNISH) AND THE ARMY PHILIPPINE DEPARTMENT TRANSLATIONS OF ABOVE MESSAGES TO BE FORWARDED TO ARMY UNIT TO BE WORKED OUT LOCALLY TO FORWARDING IN ADDITIONAL TO FORWARDING OF INTERCEPTS TO WASHINGTON BY BOTH SERVICES TO DELIVER
COM GENERAL PLAIN TRANSLATION THIS MESSAGE TO AND SWE (MORPAC)

TOP SECRET

983

GATOF
GT-10

Source: Station US papers, RG 38, MMBR, Archives II.

Station CAST was ordered to furnish rapid translations of Japanese diplomatic messages to General Douglas MacArthur in this March 25, 1941, order from Rear Admiral Royal Ingersoll, Assistant Chief of Naval Operations. General George Marshall, Army Chief of Staff, received a copy (upper right). The initials at lower left indicate that Laurance Safford, 20-G, commander of Station US, and 20-A, Captain Leigh Noyes, Director of Naval Communications, saw this dispatch. Initials EJK probably are those of Admiral Ernest J. King. A glaring omission is to be noted: nothing indicates this message was seen by Admiral Kimmel, the Pacific Fleet commander.

FT SHAFTER 5/6/41 AEM -36-
 FRTOKYO MATUOKA TO KOSHI BERLIN
 5/5/41
 -PURPLE-
 NO. CA370

GJQMF BKVPV IREMS
 73-13 XX 15397
 CA EUVVPBBGLAACGOLLEEUGA
 AIXAZKIAOCNTJCCOBCCOAJPAI
 TUKUFIFUUXWIPKWFBTNOEUAH
 EUJYIMUATAZBDFUSLWOKIWOOA
 GOETASCSNTAZPJMYOJKHBREGR
 OUMISVAMJOEUPPIHAXRAZRBOV
 LXUYISHEJEAZPILFFRPFVHG

(M) (H) (H)

Source: Station US papers. RG 38, MMBR, Archives II.

His fellow soldiers at Fort Shafter never informed Lieutenant General Walter Short that the Purple Code messages of the Japanese Foreign Ministry were being intercepted at Station FIVE, a US Army intercept facility just steps away from the Fort Shafter command post in Hawaii. This intercept of May 6, 1941, indicates that interception, decoding, and translation of Purple messages obtained by Station FIVE were speedy—they took only one day. The translation indicates that Foreign Minister Yosuke Matsuoka was concerned by a German report that the United States was reading his code messages and asked his ambassador to Germany, Baron Hiroshi Oshima, to check with the Berlin authorities.

DETERMINED TO BE AN ADMINISTRATIVE MARKING
E.O. 12065, Section 6-102
By 2211 NARS, Date 1-24-98

From: Tokyo (Matsuoka)
To : Berlin (Oshima)
5 May 1941
(Purple-CA)

#370

MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE

Please express our appreciation to STANJAA for the information in question and ask him if it is not possible to give us the authority for the statement that it has been fairly reliably established that the U.S. government is reading our code messages, so that we might take appropriate action.

Reply requested.

All copies destroyed except
(1) This original
(4) copy to Gen. Markovne

15-5-41

CAVITY TEST

151511 Bearings 12 hours 4th: YK68 TANAS
 NoNo1 at 2, KAN61 at 248, YUK63 at 92,
 SUK44 at 258, HCFU4 at 80, MET66 at 110,
 N1RA9 at 358, 8TUNA at 30

151522 Bearings 12 hours 8th: F004 and SUK47 310.
 EVENTS FOLLOW: COMBINED FLEET H0:2 FUM17 FUM64
 KONE8 MAN08 RH01 SET17 TENE9 TUW14 W12
 WAK43 YOW18. FIRST FLEET MR08.

151533 SECOND FLEET HE13 IR10 MEN07 NN04
 NY02 YU04, THIRD FLEET JRO1 SIA3 SOY08.
FOURTH FLEET HEM12 MORU2, FIFTH FLEET EN19 UFU1.
SUBFORCE WANI8. AIRRENS COMB FLEET H0H07 RAT

151544 RAT³ YON7 YUNE8. COMPAIR FORCE
 HIM06 MON01 REHE8 SHAI YO NO 1X
CHINA SENG FLEET TAK66 YUK08.
NORTH CHINA FLEET KOKUB BAN7.
SOUTH CHINA FLEET EK04 KAN61 NN09.

Source: This TESTM dispatch can be found in the Station US papers, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II.

Cryptographers at CAST intercepted radio broadcasts involving the First Air Fleet five days before the attack. These broadcasts provide convincing evidence that carrier units violated radio silence; they were intercepted by American cryptographers and radio operators on Corregidor. The First Air Fleet's radio-call signs (Yobidashi Fugo) reserved for the Hawaii attack were obtained by Station CAST in advance of the raid, according to this report received at Station HYPO on December 5, 1941. The evidence is startling: HE HO 7, YO N 7, and YU NE 8, identified by CAST as the air (carrier) squadrons of Japan's Combined Fleet, were the exclusive radio-call signs assigned for the Hawaii force. This information could only be generated from radio broadcasts in the 5-Num code, additive version 7; it confirms the reports of the Twelfth Naval District and the SS Lurline of hearing Japanese transmissions from the North Pacific.

CAST's dispatch identified the twelve secret radio-call signs for Admiral Yamamoto: HO RI 2, FU MA 7, FU NE 4, KO

NE 8, MA NO 8, RI HE1, SE TU 7, TE KE 9, TU WI 4, UI 2, WA KA 3, and YO WI Ø. Japan's submarine fleet commander took to the airwaves, broke radio silence, and was uncovered as WA HI 8.

This information was transmitted to Station HYPO over the Navy's secret TESTM radio circuit. Rodney Whitten, of the HYPO staff, signed his initials to the dispatch and confirmed that it was received in Hawaii. Admiral Kimmel was never given this information.

JAPANESE CODES

SECRET 4-22-71

MR. TOLSON:

RE: JAPANESE AND UNITED STATES
CODES DURING WORLD WAR II

Japanese Attack on Pearl Harbor

I have checked with L. Woodrow Newpher, Chief of the Cryptanalysis-Translation Section of the Laboratory, and William A. Branigan, Chief of the Espionage Section of the Domestic Intelligence Division, both of whom were in the Bureau prior to World War II and have knowledge of such matters. They advised that to their knowledge the Japanese were never able to break United States codes prior to Pearl Harbor or during the War. Mr. Newpher also advised that a very reliable book, entitled "The Code Breakers" by David Kahn on pages 582-585 also states that Japan was not successful in breaking United States codes.

On the other hand, according to the above agents, the U. S. Navy did break the Japanese military code prior to the attack on Pearl Harbor and this directly attributed to the United States victory in the battle at Midway Island and in Japanese Admiral Yamamoto's being shot down in the Pacific. The Bureau also broke an open code in one Japanese case which was handled by our New York Office. During the War, Japan changed its codes several times but the military services were able to break some of them and they, as well as the Bureau, were able to read some messages.

It is suggested that any details which could be made available be obtained through the National Security Agency, which assumed the cryptanalytic duties formerly handled by the military services during the War.

ST 104

R. R. BEAVER

MAY 25 1971

The logical person to contact at the office of the National Security Agency is Dr. Louis W. Tordella, Deputy Director, at Fort George G. Meade, Maryland - telephone number 281-2200.

RRB:crt

FBI

53 JUN 8 1971

SECRET

TOP SECRET

Mr. Tolson
Mr. Boardman
Mr. Callahan
Mr. Casper
Mr. Conrad
Mr. DeLoach
Mr. Felt
Mr. Gale
Mr. Rosen
Mr. Sullivan
Mr. Tavel
Mr. Trotter
Tele. Room
Miss Holmes
Miss Gandy

REC-40 100-97-1-507

ST 104

R. R. BEAVER

MAY 25 1971

The logical person to contact at the office of the National Security Agency is Dr. Louis W. Tordella, Deputy Director, at Fort George G. Meade, Maryland - telephone number 281-2200.

RRB:crt

FBI

53 JUN 8 1971

SECRET

TOP SECRET

Source: FBI report #100-97-1-507, FBI headquarters, FOIA Section, Washington, DC.

The FBI confirmed that the US Navy did break the Japanese military code prior to the attack. The information was passed on to Clyde Tolson, assistant to J. Edgar Hoover, by R. R. Beaver on April 22, 1971.

THIRTY-SIX AMERICANS CLEARED TO READ THE JAPANESE DIPLOMATIC AND MILITARY
INTERCEPTS IN 1941

Thirty-six Americans were cleared for unrestricted access to decoded and translated Japanese diplomatic and military intercepts obtained by American cryptographic personnel in 1941. The following list of their names, compiled by the author from routing slips found in the Station US papers at Archives II, includes more officials than previously revealed:

President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Washington, DC
Secretary of State Cordell Hull, Washington, DC
Secretary of War Henry Stimson, Washington, DC
Secretary of the Navy Frank Knox, Washington, DC
General George Marshall, Chief of Staff, US Army, Washington, DC
Admiral Harold R. Stark, Chief of Naval Operations, Washington, DC
Rear Admiral Royal Ingersoll, Assistant Chief of Naval Operations, Washington, DC
Captain Theodore Wilkinson, fourth Director of Naval Intelligence in 1941 (October 1, 1941–December 7, 1941), Washington, DC
Captain William S. Anderson, Director of Naval Intelligence, Washington, DC
Captain Jules James, second Director of Naval Intelligence (January 15, 1941–March 1941), Washington, DC
Captain Alan G. Kirk, third Director of Naval Intelligence (March–October 1941), Washington, DC
Captain Laurance Safford, Commanding Officer, Station US, Washington, DC
Captain Leigh Noyes, Director of Naval Communications, Washington, DC
Captain Roland M. Brainard, Ship Movement Officer, US Navy, Washington, DC
General Douglas MacArthur, Commander US Army forces (Philippines), Manila
Brigadier General Sherman Miles, Army Intelligence, Washington, DC
Admiral Thomas Hart, Commander of the Asiatic Fleet, Manila
Colonel Rufus Bratton, US Army courier, Washington, DC
Lieutenant Commander Alwin Kramer, US Navy courier, Washington, DC
Captain John Beardall, naval aide to President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Washington, DC (May–December 1941)
Lieutenant Commander Joseph J. Rochefort, Commander, Station HYPO, Pearl Harbor Naval Yard (July–December 1941)
Lieutenant Rudolph Fabian, Co-commander, Station CAST, Corregidor, Philippines
Lieutenant John Lietwiler, Co-commander, Station CAST, Corregidor, Philippines
Captain William A. Heard, Far East Division, Office of Naval Intelligence, Washington, DC
Captain Howard Bode, Office of Naval Intelligence, Washington, DC
Rear Admiral Richmond K. Turner, Navy War Plans Officer, Washington, DC
Commander Arthur McCollum, head of Far East Section, Office of Naval Intelligence, Washington, DC
Lieutenant Commander Ethelbert Watts, assistant to McCollum, Office of Naval Intelligence, Washington, DC
Major Rodney Boone, USMC, assistant to Arthur McCollum, Office of Naval Intelligence, Washington, DC
Lieutenant Commander Edwin Layton, Pacific Fleet intelligence officer, Pearl Harbor
Lieutenant Robert Weeks, communications intelligence aide to Admiral Ernest J. King, commander-in-chief, Atlantic Fleet, Newport, Rhode Island
Agnes Meyer Driscoll, chief civilian cryptanalyst for the US Navy, Washington, DC
Ensign Prescott Currier, assistant to Driscoll, Washington, DC
Colonel William Friedman, US Army cryptanalyst, Washington, DC
Admiral Husband E. Kimmel, commander-in-chief, Pacific Fleet, Pearl Harbor (access restricted)
Lieutenant General Walter Short, commanding general Hawaiian Department, US Army, Fort Shafter, Oahu (access restricted)

Source: White House Route logs and Station US files, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II.

A guide for quotations, sources, and events:

The principal end notes refer to:

PHPT (Pearl Harbor Part) A thirty-nine-volume transcript of eight official United States investigations of the Pearl Harbor attack that were held between December 22, 1941 and May 31, 1946. The volumes were numbered by the US Government Printing Office as parts 1 through 39 in the original publication at Washington, DC in 1946. Most major libraries in the United States carry the entire set. The eight investigations were:

1. Roberts Commission, December 22, 1941 to January 23, 1942 (Parts 22 through 25, PHPT 22–25).
2. Inquiry by Admiral Thomas Hart, February 12, 1944 to June 15, 1944 (PHPT 26).
3. Army Pearl Harbor Board Proceedings, August 7, 1944 to October 6, 1944 (PHPT 27–31).
4. Navy Court of Inquiry, July 24, 1944 to September 27, 1944 (PHPT 32–33).
5. Clarke Proceedings, September 20, 1944 to August 4, 1945 (PHPT 34).
6. Clausen Proceedings, December 1, 1944 to September 14, 1945 (PHPT 35).
7. Hewitt Proceedings, May 14, 1945 to July 11, 1945 (PHPT 36–38).
8. Hearings of the Joint Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbor Attack, Congress of the United States, November 15, 1945 to May 31, 1946. Parts 1–11 are transcripts of testimony. Parts 12–21 are exhibits of JOINT.

During the course of research for this book between 1982 and 1999, the National Archives made major changes in its archival policy. A new facility called Archives II was constructed on the campus of the University of Maryland at College Park, Maryland, a community within the Beltway. In 1994 military records were split between Archives I (7th Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington DC) and Archives II (College Park). Timothy Nenninger, head of military records at Archives II, provided details concerning the storage policy of United States military records for readers of this book: “The several hundred thousand cubic feet of permanently valuable military records accessioned by the National Archives, which date from the period of the American Revolution to the 1960s and 1970s, have been split between the National Archives Building in downtown Washington and the new archival facility Archives II at College Park, Maryland. Military records pre-dating World War II are housed in the National Archives Building in Washington; military records from World War II and after are stored in Archives II at College Park.” Nenninger’s office and his staff of archivists are located in Room 2400, A-II at College Park, 8601 Adelphi Road, College Park, Maryland 20740-6001. Telephone (301) 713-7250. The major Record Groups that Mr. Nenninger and his predecessor, Clarence Lyons, made available to the author through Freedom of Information Act requests (FOIA) are:

PHLO is a collection of documents obtained for the Joint Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbor Attack, Congress of the United States, abbreviated in this book as JOINT. The investigation was conducted by a special committee appointed by the US Senate and US House of Representatives in 1945–46. To facilitate acquisition of documents and witnesses for JOINT the US Navy established the Pearl Harbor Liaison Office headed by Lieutenant Commander John Baecher. The PHLO records are currently housed in Record Group 80, Modern Military Records Branch (MMRB), Archives II, College Park, Maryland.

Station US papers is a collection of approximately one million documents—some in original paper form, some in micro fiche—involving communications intelligence originally assembled by Station US and its successor the Naval Security Group Command. This collection can be found in RG 38, Modern Military Records Branch, Archives II. The author was given FOIA access to Boxes 1–20 on Monday, January 23, 1995 by Clarence Lyons, then head of what was called Textual Reference Branch, now known as Modern Military Records Branch. The January 1995 FOIA release contained about 6000 documents.

President Jimmy Carter’s release of 1979 refers to over 300,000 decrypted and translated Japanese naval intercepts from the Pacific War dating from July 1941 to late fall 1945 and released as Record Group 457, SRN series (Special Research Navy). A major drawback for researchers: the collection is arranged by SRN numbers (starting at 1), not chronologically.

The author will deposit Day of Deceit's entire research collection of cited documents, recorded audio and video tapes, photographs and graphics, including negatives, in his permanent collection housed at the Hoover Institution Archives, Stanford University, Stanford, California. This collection will be open for public use.

Japanese persons' names are reported in this book in US style, with the given name first, then the family name. In traditional Japanese usage, the family name comes first.

1. Janet Murrow discussed the post-Pearl Harbor dilemma with Ann Sperber, author of Murrow: His Life and Times (Freundlich Publications Inc., 1986), p. 207; see also personal correspondence between author and Sperber in author's file.
2. For Murrow's Gunther quote, see Sperber, Murrow, p. 208. The White House Sunday night suppers were described by William Seale, White House historian, in personal communication to the author, August 31 and September 1, 1993 and August 28, 1995 in author's file.
3. For the Polo Grounds quote see Troy, Donovan and The CIA (University Publications of America, Inc., 1981), p. 115. James Roosevelt had joined Donovan's staff in August 1941 and worked from the Coordinator of Information office in the South Building, 25th and E Street NW in Washington. FBI chief J. Edgar Hoover, using special messengers, dispatched secret reports concerning Japanese espionage to Captain James Roosevelt at the COI building. See FBI file 61-10556251; 380X, 448.
4. Donovan's account was confirmed by William J. vanden Heuvel of New York in telephone conversations with the author, January 22 and February 13, 1998. Mr. vanden Heuvel said he still has the diary.
5. Whitehead note, see Anthony Cave Brown, Wild Bill Donovan: The Last Hero (Times Books, 1982) pp. 6, 7. Brown's version of the meeting echoes some aspects of the October 7, 1940 memorandum of Lieutenant Commander Arthur McCollum. (See chapter 2 herein). Note Brown's reference to an "overt act" and FDR's concern for unification of America. For further details on T. North Whitehead see Joseph Lash, Roosevelt and Churchill 1939-1941 (W. W. Norton, 1976), p. 291.
6. Ann Sperber to author, Dec. 1, 1992, in author's file. Sperber died in February 1994. John Chamberlain's article was in LIFE, September 24, 1945.
7. See Ann Sperber, Murrow, p. 207.
8. For Knox's report, see United Press story in Honolulu Advertiser, December 16, 1941.
9. For comments on the President's surprise, see Brown, Wild Bill Donovan, p. 6. Mr. vanden Heuvel confirmed to the author that he had allowed Brown access to the diary, see note 4 above.

1. Memorandum from Lieut. Cdr. Arthur H. McCollum (promoted to Commander, Captain and retired as Rear Admiral) to ONI Director Captain Walter Stratton Anderson (promoted to Rear Admiral, Retired as Vice Admiral), dated October 7, 1940 in Arthur H. McCollum's classified personal file, RG 38, Station US papers, Box 6, folder 5750-15, Archives II, College Park, Maryland. Reproduced in full in Appendix A. In this book, McCollum's memorandum of October 7, 1940 will be referred to as the eight-action memo.
2. McCollum's oral history is the source for his early history, his adolescent years in Japan, his initial US Navy experience and his assignment to Prince Regent Hirohito. This information is found in volume 1 of The Reminiscences of Rear Admiral Arthur H. McCollum, USN Ret. (US Naval Institute, 1973), published in two volumes, softbound manuscript form, hereafter referred to as MACOH. The oral history interview starts December 8, 1970, and was conducted by John T. Mason, Jr., of the US Naval Institute. For McCollum's instructing Prince Hirohito see pp. 56, 58. Author's copy of the McCollum Oral History manuscript was prepared April 4, 1995 from original McCollum-Mason masters by Ann Hassinger, of the History Section of the USNI. In author's file.
3. Code names such as F-2 for intelligence officers are quite common.
4. The eight actions are found on page 4, section 9 of McCollum's memorandum. On page 4, the handwritten word "act" appears to have been added by pen to section 10 in the original typewritten copy, found by the author in RG 38, Archives II, College Park, Maryland. See copy in Appendix A. The phrase "overt act" involving Japan can be found in newspaper language. See an article in the New York Times, October 9, 1940 in which the Times's Far East reporter Hallett Abend reports a Japanese "overt act" against China.
5. Captain Dudley Knox's comments will be found attached to McCollum's eight-action memo. See Appendix A.
6. "Not precipitate," Knox, loc. cit.
7. Capt. Walter S. Anderson's classified correspondence file, which would contain McCollum's original memorandum, has not been found in Archives II. McCollum and Anderson had a very close personal relationship: "I was Admiral Anderson's fair-haired boy," MACOH, p. 269. Two US government officials—Arthur H. McCollum, who authored the eight-action memo and Captain Dudley Knox, the endorser—saw the eight-action memorandum. President Roosevelt can be directly linked (see citations in Note 8 below) to six of McCollum's proposed actions: namely Actions B and G, curtailing Japanese access to natural resources of Southeast Asia—for he met with Dutch officials and received Japanese intercepts concerning Japan-Dutch negotiations in 1940–41; Action C, aid to China: FDR directed the Administration's China strategy which antagonized Japan's leaders who were engaged in war with China. On September 25, 1940 the Administration approved a $25 million loan to China's US-recognized government, headed by Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek: see Breckenridge Long, The War Diary of Breckenridge Long (University of Nebraska Press, 1966), p. 132. On April 15, 1941, FDR issued an executive order authorizing US Army, Navy, and Marine Corps officers to voluntarily serve with the Flying Tigers Air Force, led by former US Army Air Corps Colonel Claire Chennault. The Flying Tigers openly trained in Burma for air battle with the Japanese. See John Toland, The Rising Sun (Random House, 1970), p. 127; Action C continued into the fall of 1941, when President Roosevelt sent his personal advisor, Henry F. Grady, to join a special US commission formed to provide additional support for China. The group was headed by Major General John Magruder, former US Army intelligence chief. See The Magic Background of Pearl Harbor (Department of Defense), Vol. III, narrative, p. 266, item 566. FDR's direct links to Actions D, F, and H are detailed in Note 8 below.
8. The conclusive evidence that links FDR or high-level administration officials to the eight action proposals is as follows. Action A: Arrange for US use of British Pacific Bases. Arrangements were made for US use of Rabaul's Simpson Harbor, a British possession in New Britain in the South Pacific, as USN Advance Pacific Base F. Orders came from Admiral Harold Stark, FDR's Chief of Naval Operations. See special secret file NB/AB "F" (4), Special Advance Base—Pacific "F" in RG 181, Twelfth Naval District, National Archives, San Bruno, California. Base "F" leasing arrangements were in progress at time of Pearl Harbor. Japanese forces captured Rabaul in spring 1942 and ended US plans for Base "F." Actions B and G: Urged the Dutch to cutoff Japanese access to natural resources in Southeast Asia. See summary of intercepted Japanese diplomatic dispatches routed to FDR, October 16, 1940. Lt. Cdr. Arthur Mc Collum entitled the summary: "Japanese Plans to Seize the Dutch East Indies," and routed it "Original to Aide to the President." See copy in Appendix D. FDR met with Dutch Foreign Minister Eelco Nicolaas van Kleffens and US Undersecretary of State Sumner Welles during a 70-minute conference in the Oval Office,

March 19, 1941. See White House Usher Diary, 3/19/41, Franklin D. Roosevelt Library, Hyde Park, NY, hereafter FDRL. See photo of van Kleffens and Dutch Ambassador to the US Alexander Loudon—after concluding the presidential conference—outside the Oval Office and van Kleffens’ comments to news reporters published in Knickerbocker Weekly, March 31, 1941, p. 13. For Dutch-Japanese negotiations see the account by Dutch negotiator H. J. van Mook: The Netherlands Indies and Japan (London: George Allen & Unwin Ltd., 1944). See Action D: “Send cruisers” in this chapter. Action E: “Send US submarines to Orient.” See letter re dispatch of US subs to Manila, from Admiral Harold Stark to Admiral James O. Richardson, November 12, 1940, PHPT 14, p. 971, and US Assistant Secretary of State Breckenridge Long, War Diary, p. 155. Long writes that twelve submarines were sent from Honolulu to Manila. Action F: Retain the US Fleet in Hawaiian waters. See discussion in this and following chapters. See transcript of Oval Office audio tape of October 4, 1940, 48–61:1 (1) and (2) FDRL, in which President Roosevelt can be heard discussing “fool things that Japan might do.”

THE PRESIDENT: “This country is, aah, ready to pull the trigger if the Japs do anything. I mean we won’t stand any nonsense, public opinion won’t in the country from the Japs, if they do some fool thing.” (Position 322 on tape.)

THE PRESIDENT: “And the time may be coming when the Germans and the Japs will do some fool thing that would put us in. That’s the only real danger of our getting in, is that their foot will slip.” (Position 337 on tape.) Transcript by author from the October 4, 1940 tape using Sony cassette recorder, December 2, 1995. In author’s file. The FDRL does not have an official transcript of FDR’s Oval Office audio tapes, according to archivist Robert Parks. Action H: A complete embargo of Japan. A total embargo was issued by the President on July 26, 1941. See Executive Order 8832, Federal Register this date in National Archives I, 7th Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington. For Japanese reaction to Action H, see (no editor) The Magic Background of Pearl Harbor (US Department of Defense, 1977), Vol. II, Appendix, p. A-226, item 447. See also discussion concerning Japanese embargoes by FDR, Secretary of State Cordell Hull, Undersecretary of State Sumner Welles, and Assistant Secretary of State Breckenridge Long in War Diary, October 10, 1940, p. 140.

9. See Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson’s diary entry of Nov. 25, 1941, where the FDR war cabinet discussed “letting Japan fire the first shot.” The cabinet believed this would unite the American people in the war effort; see PHPT 11, p. 5421.
10. The following (and probably more) knew of McCollum’s eight-action policy that was adopted by FDR, according to direct and indirect evidence outlined herein: President Roosevelt; Lieutenant Commander Arthur H. McCollum; Captains Walter S. Anderson and Dudley Knox; Admirals Harold Stark, James O. Richardson, and William Leahy; General George Marshall; Commander Vincent Murphy. (Ranks listed as of the fall of 1940.) Parallels of “firing first shot” and “overt act of war” can be found in the United States war warnings of November 27 and 28, 1941, which directed America’s Pacific commanders: “The United States desires that Japan commit the first overt act.” See Appendix C.
11. Documentation that directly links FDR with McCollum’s Action D—sending US Navy cruisers in provocative moves against Japan includes the following: first discussion in the White House Feb. 10, 1941. Present were President Roosevelt, Secretary of State Cordell Hull, Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of the Navy Frank Knox, General George Marshall, Army Chief of Staff, and Admiral Harold R. Stark, Chief of Naval Operations. Stark warned FDR that the cruises “will precipitate hostilities,” PHPT 16-2150 and PHPT 33, p. 1203. FDR advocated the cruises; see Stark in PHPT 33, p. 1203.
12. FDR called them “pop-up cruises” according to Admiral Stark. See B. Mitchell Simpson, III, Admiral Harold R. Stark (University of South Carolina Press, 1989), pp. 101, 102.
13. Admiral Husband E. Kimmel wrote to Stark on February 18, 1941 and said the proposed cruises were “most ill advised,” PHPT 33-1199; “I fought but the decision may go against me,” Stark to Kimmel, Feb. 10, 1941, PHPT 33-1197.
14. For Prime Minister Winston Churchill’s advocating dispatch of US cruisers to Singapore see his message to FDR, October 4, 1940 in Warren E. Kimball, ed., Churchill and Roosevelt: The Complete Correspondence, (Princeton University Press, 1984) Vol. I, p. 74. In this dispatch, Churchill wrote that sending American warships to Singapore might prevent spreading of the war. McCollum held a different view and used the Singapore proposal as one of eight provocations he thought would entice Japan into an overt act of war. Ultimately, no US warships were sent to Singapore.
15. Three pop-up cruises can be documented. (1) The first sailed during March 15-21, 1941. See testimony of Vice Admiral John H. Newton who led a task group of four USN cruisers: USS Brooklyn, USS Savannah, USS Chicago, and USS Portland. Together with a squadron of twelve destroyers sailed into the Central and South Pacific adjacent to Japanese territory. Newton told the Hart Investigation of Pearl Harbor that his orders were highly secret and directed to him verbally, PHPT 26-340. But the cruise was not too secret. The presence of the US warships in the South Pacific was leaked to Australian newspapers which announced the ships’ arrival in news dispatches. The

- news reports were seen by the Japanese consulate in Honolulu and forwarded to Japan's Foreign Minister Yosuke Matsuoka in Tokyo. See the consulate's intercepted message to Matsuoka at PHPT 35, p. 431, and PHPT, 37, p. 1026. (2) A second cruise took US warships to Central and South Pacific regions adjacent to the eastern Japanese Mandates; see RG 24, deck logs of USS Salt Lake City and USS Northampton, July and Aug. 1941, Archives II. (3) For a pop-up cruise in Bungo Strait see US Naval attaché Tokyo Confidential Serial 220230 of Aug. 23, 1941, RG 38, Station US papers release of Jan. 1995, Archives II. A copy of Japan's protest was forwarded to FDR.
16. For Bungo Strait report, Serial 220230, loc. cit.
 17. Ibid.
 18. See New York Times, October 9, 1940, p. 1.
 19. Reconstruction of the Oval Office meeting is based in three accounts: (1) Richardson's memoirs, On The Treadmill To Pearl Harbor; (2) Richardson's testimony to Congress starting at PHPT, 1, p. 253; and (3) secret Oval Office audio recordings of October 8, 1940, FDR Library in Hyde Park, NY. Roosevelt's voice is easily recognized on the Oval Office audio tapes which were originally recorded on an RCA recording device, then rerecorded on cassette tape for public use by FDRL. There are no minutes of the nearly three-hour luncheon meeting existing in the FDR Library files at Hyde Park, according to archivist Robert Parks. In addition to FDR and Richardson, Admiral William Leahy USN (Retired), then governor of Puerto Rico, participated. Leahy makes no reference to the meeting in his memoirs I Was There (New York: Whittlesey House, McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc., 1950).
 20. See James O. Richardson, On The Treadmill to Pearl Harbor (Washington, DC, Naval History Division, Department of the Navy, 1973), p. 435. Hereafter, cited as Richardson, Treadmill.
 21. "Sacrifice of ship," "sooner or later," and "overt act." Richardson, Treadmill, ibid, p. 427.
 22. See Complete Presidential Press Conferences of Franklin D. Roosevelt (DaCapo Press, 1972), Vol. 16, pp. 259–260.
 23. Kiplinger Newsletter cited in Richardson, Treadmill, p. 402.
 24. Nimitz "begged off," see E. B. Potter, Nimitz (US Naval Institute Press, 1976), p. 9.
 25. See Richardson, Treadmill, for "did not give a damn," p. 442; Stark derelict, ibid, pp. 450-451.
 26. See Husband E. Kimmel, Admiral Kimmel's Story (Henry Regnery Company, 1955); Roosevelt maneuvering, ibid. p. 2; "supply me promptly," ibid. p. 79
 27. For Richardson quotes of "Stark negligent," "kept advised," "fire it along," and "compounded," see Richardson, Treadmill, p. 450. Richardson never explained his failure to inform Kimmel of the Oval Office meeting of October 8, 1940. Stark clarified his nickname "Betty" to JOINT: "When I went to the Naval Academy the history that we studied there had the statement of old General John Stark, who was one of my forebears, that 'We win today or Betty Stark will be a widow tonight.' The histories that I had always studied at home were, 'We win today or Molly Stark will be a widow tonight.' Every time an upper classman came in my room when I was a plebe I had to get up and say, 'We win today or Betty Stark will be a widow tonight.'" See PHPT 5-2172.
 28. Richardson, Treadmill, p. 450.
 29. The military assistance portion of the Tripartite Pact is in Article 3: "Germany, Italy and Japan agree to cooperate in their efforts on the aforesaid basis. They further undertake to assist one another with all political, economic and military means, if one of the three Contracting Parties is attacked by a Power at present not involved in the European war or in the Chinese-Japanese conflict." PHPT 6-2852. See McCollum's correspondence with attorney Paul Freeman of Philadelphia, concerning whether President Roosevelt used Japan as a back-door approach to war, MACOH, Vol. 1, Appendix. During the Joint Congressional Investigation, Senator Scott Lucas (D., Illinois) asked McCollum if the Pacific Fleet had been used as a deliberate trick to decoy Japan into war. McCollum, apparently forgetting his Action F, replied, "No." MACOH, p. 799.
 30. Strategic danger outlines, see Sections 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of McCollum's eight-action memo of October 8, 1940 in Appendix A.
 31. "Ado," see Section 9, p. 4, ibid.
 32. Long, The War Diary, p. 136.
 33. See Richardson, Treadmill, p. 307 ff., where he provides background for basing the fleet at Pearl Harbor.
 34. Called the American Committee for Nonparticipation in Japanese Aggression, this citizens' group advocated withholding war materials from Japan. It was headed by Roger Green and included such prominent Americans as Henry L. Stimson, later to be FDR's Secretary of War, Admiral Harry E. Yarnell, and Henry L. Harriman, former president of the US Chamber of Commerce; see report on activities of the Committee in Donald J. Friedman, The Road from Isolation (Harvard University Press. 1968). Prominent news executives William Allen White of the Emporia, Kansas Gazette and Jonathan Daniels of the Raleigh, North Carolina News-Observer were associated with the group. Green had notable connections in Washington, according to Friedman.
 35. McCollum taught a Japanese language course in Tokyo; Edwin Layton, And I Was There (William Morrow and Company, 1985), p. 39.

36. On McCollum's delivery to FDR, see MACOH p. 708, and p. 4 of McCollum's letter of July 13, 1954 to Paul Freeman, a Philadelphia attorney who had questioned McCollum's review of a book in the Saturday Review of Literature, July 3, 1954: "The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy when they were in Washington, as they usually were, were advised just as promptly as the President of the information contained in the Japanese telegrams." MACOH, Volume 1, Appendix.
37. Fourteen presidential routing indicators were found in Station US files: (1) "The President: Original," typed; (2) "P," rubber stamp; (3) "P" with a circle, rubber stamp; (4) "PR" with one star, rubber stamp; (5) "PR" with two stars, rubber stamp; (6) Routing block stamp for naval aide's initials; (7) "Special delivery to President" by Adm. Stark, typed; (8) "Special delivery to President," by Rear Admiral McIntyre (his physician), typed; (9) "Aide to President (Show)," typed; (10) "Aide to Pres. (Show)," typed; (11) "Aide to Pres.," typed; (12) "NAVAIDE," typed and handwritten; (13) Original to Aide to the President," typed, and (14) "Original to the Aide to the President," typed. See RG 38, Station US papers, Mod. Mil. Ref. Br., Archives II. Station US papers refer to the release, on January 23, 1995, of 20 boxes containing pre-Pearl Harbor communications intelligence records gathered by the US military pertaining to Japan; these released pursuant to a FOIA request filed by the author. The released files are kept in a separate research area at Archives II, according to Timothy Nenninger, head of the Modern Military Records Branch (MMRB), sometimes called Military Reference Branch. Arthur McCollum's eight-action memo is in Box 6. The National Security Agency refused to reveal the Japanese diplomatic code used in the intercepts delivered to the Tuscaloosa. Most likely it is the J series, probably J-15. All details of the routing system were shrouded in secrecy. Even as this book was being completed in 1999, thousands of these documents remained classified or unavailable for public examination. See "Trip of the President," White House Diary and Itineraries, February 14–March 2, 1940. FDRL. See RG 24, Deck Log of USS Tuscaloosa, February 25, 1940, in Archives II. The intercepts are in RG 38, Station US papers released January 23, 1995, Archives II, OP16-F-2, no serial number, dated February 23, 1940. Two destroyers, USS Lang and USS Jouett, escorted the President and carried fifteen members of the news media. Commander Daniel J. Callaghan, then forty-eight years old, was assigned as FDR's naval aide in June 1938 and remained in that post until May 1941. He became a presidential favorite, one of the boys. Roosevelt bragged of teaching "neophyte" Callaghan the techniques of deep sea fishing during a cruise to the Galapagos Islands in the summer of 1938, see Geoffrey C. Ward, ed., Closest Companion (Houghton Mifflin Company, 1995), p. 117. Later Callaghan was promoted to captain, then to rear admiral. He commanded Navy warships and task groups in the Pacific War following his White House assignment. Callaghan was held in high esteem by the officers and men of his command, according to naval historian Samuel Eliot Morison in his History of United States Naval Operations in World War II (Little, Brown and Company, 1949), Vol. V, p. 236. Daniel J. Callaghan was killed in action during a night battle with Japanese warships near Guadalcanal on Friday, November 13, 1942.
38. FDR's "no foreign war" assurance was given at Philadelphia, October 23, 1940 and paraphrased in Boston, October 30, 1940. See Richardson, Treadmill, p. 435.
39. For "fight if attacked," see Robert Sherwood: Roosevelt and Hopkins (Harper & Brothers 1948), p. 191.
40. See PHPT 1, p. 467 and PHPT 2, p. 549. The United States Fleet was the major command of the United States Navy afloat prior to February 1, 1941. There was no Pacific Fleet or Atlantic Fleet. The commander-in-chief was known as CINCUS—an unfortunate acronym. CINCUS warships moved between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans but under the single CINCUS command. A small group of warships separately stationed on the East Coast was known as the Atlantic Squadron. In the Pacific the warships at Pearl Harbor were called the Hawaiian Detachment. A small Navy command stationed in the Philippines was called the Asiatic Fleet.
41. Welles quote "diplomatic disaster" is in PHPT 2, p. 467.
42. Italy quote comes from Richardson, Treadmill, p. 307.
43. "Europe first," see ibid. pp. 332, 333.
44. For the objections to Hawaii, see ibid. pp. 324, 326, 327.
45. "It looks probable," ibid. p. 308.
46. "Nitwit," ibid. p. 309.
47. FDR's promise "not to send the fleet," see ibid. p. 384. Richardson sought transportation orders to Washington so he could protest the Hawaii policy direct to the Administration. During the period of July 5–17, 1940, Richardson and his war plans officer, Commander Vincent R. Murphy, flew to Washington traveling under assumed names: Richardson as Mr. Mandley, Murphy as Mr. McCleary. The admiral met with FDR for lunch on July 8, 1940. Later in the week meetings were held with Secretary of the Navy Frank Knox, Secretary of State Cordell Hull, Undersecretary of State Sumner Welles, Army Chief of Staff George Marshall, Senator James Byrnes, and Stanley Hornbeck, State Department Far East expert. It was the first of two meetings the admiral had with the President in 1940. The second was three months later, on October 8.

48. US naval strength was projected at 145,000 total according to 1940 figures, per Richardson Treadmill, p. 434; belligerent activity, ibid, p. 319.
49. Japan led by military men, Treadmill, ibid. p. 333.
50. San Francisco Japanese consulate report, September 16, 1940: see Appendix D, herein.
51. “No difficulty” intercept, see Appendix D, herein. Crude oil purchased in metric tons equals 7.33 barrels per metric ton according to a report in the 1997 edition of the British Petroleum Statistical Review; courtesy American Petroleum Institute, Washington, DC.
52. For discussion concerning the US giving the green light to Japanese acquisition of petroleum products, see Department of State, Foreign Relations of the United States: The Far East, 1940 (USGPO, 1955), Vol. IV, pp. 805, 806. Quoted in Jonathan Marshall, To Have and Have Not (University of California Press, 1995), p. 177.
53. See Tracking Chart 1 in insert herein. Original in RG 181, USN Secret A-6 files, National Archives, Seattle, WA.
54. For commercial facilities see Commandant, Eleventh Naval District, secret serial C-76 of April 4, 1940, RG 181, Box 196741, National Archives, Laguna Niguel, CA.
55. Tankers and their trans-Pacific routes are identified on Tracking Chart 1.
56. See Tracking Chart 1 in insert herein. For US Navy tracking of the tankers, see Tracking Chart 1, and for more details see Twelfth Naval District’s (COM12) 1941 weekly tracking reports of foreign merchant vessels. The reports start with a January 14, 1941 letter from Admiral James O. Richardson, commander-in-chief of the US Fleet, who asked COM 12 to keep him informed of the tracking of the foreign merchant vessels “in the event of actual hostilities.” The file, declassified for the author by Michael Anderson of San Bruno National Archives on November 1, 1984, covers January-December 1941 and is entitled “Foreign Merchant Ship-Movement Reports” found in RG 181-58-3223, QS1/EF(8), storage location 4006, Genl. Correspondence, Secret and Confidential, National Archives, San Bruno, CA.

For COM 12 named as coordinator see OPNAV Confidential Serial 016916 of February 17, 1940 in RG 181 classified records, National Archives, San Bruno, CA.

Kyokuto Maru was requisitioned by Japan’s navy from a private shipping firm, hence, Maru. HIMJS Shiriyu was a Japanese naval tanker and should be identified as His Imperial Majesty’s Japanese Ship (HIMJS). Japanese Marus (merchant vessels) were assigned a permanent four letter commercial international radio call sign (RCS) by the Berne (Switzerland) International Radio Convention, known as the Berne List. All Japanese Maru commercial radio identification began with the letter J. The Berne List assigned JWTI to the Kyokuto Maru. The tanker used the call sign to contact American and worldwide radio sources. But in the secret Japanese naval communication scheme, the RCS for the Kyokuto Maru was I WI 2 during November 1941; see Special Research Navy (SRN) 115787 RG 457, Archives II. For the Berne List see Secret folder 077/01, RG 38, Station US papers, Archives II. The significance of the word Maru is similar to “red sails in the sunset” in Western culture. In Japanese, the word maru means “circle”; the Japanese believe that ships complete a circle and return loved ones home safely. Warships of the Imperial Japanese Navy are not called Maru, since they risk not completing a circle. (This explanation courtesy of Kimi and George Matsumoto of Oakland, CA.)
57. See chapter 5 of this book for a discussion on the Purple Code system.
58. A purple cover-binder, made by the ACCO Corp. of Chicago, enclosed the Navy’s solution, hence the name. The Purple Code is not fully understood by some journalists and authors, who confuse it with the 5-Num code of the Japanese navy. See Naval History, December 1997, p. 37. Historian William Manchester made a similar mistake in referring to “Admiral Yamamoto’s Purple Code” in The Glory and the Dream (Bantam Books, 1975), p. 269.
59. For confirmation of the 5-Num code designation assigned to the Akagi, see intercept SRN 115474 in Station US Papers, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II. Beware of the censored version of SRN 115474 in RG 457, Archives II, which blacks out the 5-Num code. For the 29 systems of the Kaigun Ango, see Kanya Miyauchi, Niitaka Yama Nobore. (Tokyo: Rikkyou Shuppan, 1976), p. 135. (Climb Mount Niitaka.)
60. For a copy of the original text of Admiral Ingersoll’s secret letter, see RG 38, CNO Secret serial 081420 of October 4, 1940, SRH 355, Vol. 1, pp. 395–397, Archives II. Beware of the censored copy in Special Research History (SRH) 149, RG 38. Copies of both documents are available in author’s file. Admiral Ingersoll’s letter was prepared by Station US personnel, signed by Ingersoll, and forwarded to Admiral James Richardson, CINCUS; Admiral Thomas Hart, CinC Asiatic Fleet; Rear Admiral J. M. Smeallie, COM16; and Admiral Claude Bloch, COM 14. In 1940–41 America’s major war plan was code-named Rainbow and each potential enemy was designated by color. Orange was Japan. For a discussion of Rainbow war plans see Edward S. Miller, War Plan Orange: The U. S. Strategy to Defeat Japan, 1897–1945 (US Naval Institute Press, 1991).
61. Ingersoll’s secret letter, loc. cit.
62. Ibid. Decoding and translation of the Japanese Navy’s 5-Num dispatches remain controversial as this book goes to press. Duane Whitlock, traffic analyst at Station CAST in 1941, wrote that “It was absolutely impossible for anyone in the United States to decode any of the JN-25 (sic) messages Station H intercepted in November 1941.” See e-mail from Whitlock to author, May 22, 1999, author’s file. For another viewpoint on American decoding of Japanese naval messages, see chapter 10, herein, where General George C. Marshall, head of the US Army in 1941, called a secret meeting in Washington, DC on November 15, 1941, and told select reporters that the United States had broken Japanese codes. Marshall informed the reporters that he expected a Japanese attack on the United States during the first ten days of December 1941, based on intercepted and decrypted Japanese messages.

1. Roosevelt's 1940 presidential race with Wendell Willkie, the Republican nominee, was almost neck and neck on September 4, 1940, according to a Gallup Poll. See New York Times (NYT) p. 20. Roosevelt held a slim lead of 50 percent over Willkie's 49 percent, according to Gallup.
2. See Stefan Terzibaschitsch, Aircraft Carriers of the U.S. Navy (Annapolis: US Naval Institute Press. 1989), p. 304, which lists totals of CV (large carriers), CVL (light carriers) and CVE (escort carriers) built in the US for WWII.
3. For a description of the fistfight on the House floor the night of September 4, 1940 see NYT, September 5, 1940.
4. For Willkie's remarks on the destroyer deal, see NYT, September 7, 1940.
5. Nye quote is from NYT, September 2, 1940; Bridges was quoted in AP dispatch, NYT, September 2, 1940; editorial in St. Louis Post-Dispatch was excerpted in NYT, September 3, 1940; Ackerman was quoted in NYT, September 1, 1940.
6. Roosevelt spoke at Newfound Gap, Tennessee, September 2, 1940, during the dedication of Great Smoky Mountains National Park. See NYT, September 3, 1940, for full text.
7. Ibid.
8. For "Garden hose" press conference of December 17, 1940, see Complete Presidential Press Conferences of Franklin D. Roosevelt (DaCapo Press. 1972), Vol. 16, p. 354.
9. Bridges, prepared statement excerpt quoted by AP in NYT, September 2, 1940.
10. For discussion on the Oval Office recordings done in 1940 by President Roosevelt, see article by Professor Robert J. C. Butow in American Heritage (Feb./Mar., and Oct./Nov. 1982). Schlesinger discusses the President's reason for the recordings in ibid. p. 9.
11. On September 6, 1940, FDR discussed the Grant-Howard dispatch in audio tape 48-61:1 (3), transcribed by the author from cassettes furnished by FDRL. The sound quality is good, though some conversation is unintelligible. "Down and out physically and mentally" can be heard at tape location 19; "Wouldn't say anything more" is heard at tape location 59.
12. FDR scorns NYT editorial during Oval Office meeting with Speaker Sam Rayburn (D., Texas) and House Floor Leader John McCormack (D., Mass.). Meeting recorded on October 4, 1940, audio tape 48-61-1 (1) and (2) FDRL.
13. FDR's voice comes through loud and clear on his statement that the Axis Powers "want me licked on November fifth." Audio tape of October 4, 1940, 48-61-1 (1) and (2) starting at tape location 187.
14. Matthews article is in NYT, Oct. 4, 1940; editorial is in ibid.
15. Evidence of Axis directions, see Arthur McCollum's eight-action memo of Oct. 7, 1940, p. 1, item 2, first sentence, where he writes, "There is considerable evidence to support the view that Germany and Italy." See Appendix A herein.
16. FDR discussing "more worry" is heard on October 4, 1940 audio tape 48-61:1 (1) and (2) tape location 333.
17. Ibid.
18. Ibid. Apparently the President is discussing a United Press story distributed on Oct. 2, 1940. Roosevelt can be heard describing the story, which was published in all the Scripps Howard newspapers. The "God" quote is heard at tape location 333. The tape started with Roosevelt's saying "Hello"; FDR audio tape 48-61: 1 (2), Oct. 4, 1940.
19. FDR retreats to his study, see Helen Morris, ed., At Random (Random House, Winter 1993), p. 26. For 1940 election returns, see NYT, Nov. 5, 1940, p. 1.
20. FDR quote is from NYT, ibid. same date.
21. On British expectation of Japan-US war, see letter dated Nov. 12, 1940 from Admiral Harold Stark to Admiral Thomas Hart, Commander of the Asiatic Fleet: "British expect USA to be in the war a few days after reelection of Roosevelt," PHPT 16-2448.
22. Matsuoka "worst" quote is from intercept of January 30, 1941. See Appendix D, this book.
23. Matsuoka, ibid. The "worst" strategy change involved the ABCD powers (America, British, Chinese, Dutch). It was first revealed by Japanese diplomatic radio messages intercepted by US Army and Navy listening posts. See Matsuoka's message of January 30, 1941 in Appendix D where he used the "worst" word and writes that Japan is "being prepared for the worst."

English translations of 1941 Japanese Foreign Office intercepts containing the word or phrase "worse," "worse comes to worse," and similar uses can be found in Department of Defense, The Magic Background of Pearl Harbor (USGPO, 1977).

January 30, 1941 is Matsuoka's dispatch Vol. 1, p. A-76 item 118. Other examples follow.

February 8, 1941: "Accompanying the worsening of Japanese-American relations" Vol. 1, p. A-105, item 190.

March 11, 1941: "If the worst comes to worst the US will back up England." Vol. I, p. A-204, item 390.

June 2, 1941: "If worse comes to worst, we consider Mexico City" Vol. II, p. A-192, item 384.

July 7, 1941: "If worse comes to worse." Vol. II, p. A-185, item 369.

July 12, 1941: Re Japanese merchant ship recall, "when the worse comes to the worst," Vol. II, p. A-171, item 340.

July 23, 1941: "Whenever the situation should become worse," Vol. II, p. A-186, item 370.

November 28, 1941: "When we are about to face the worst of situations," Vol. IV, p. A-250, item 526.

American reaction to the "worse" policy (which meant war) can be found in the printed record of the Joint Congressional Committee:

September 21, 1941: Washington dispatched an order to Admiral Kimmel listing ships to remain in Pearl Harbor "in case of worse conditions" and "would deal with the worse situation." See testimony of Admiral Richmond K. Turner, US Navy War Plans officer in 1941, to JOINT, PHPT 4, p. 2027.

December 4, 1941 (Java Time): See Japan's "worse" policy revealed in radio intercept of the Winds Code sent by American Consul General Walter Foote in Batavia to the Secretary of State, December 4, 1941 (Java Time). Foote quotes the Japanese introduction to the Winds code: "When crisis leading to the worse," see PHPT 8, p. 3589.

Bibliographical note: Volumes II, III, and IV of Magic have separate narrative and appendix volumes (The A distinguishes the appendix). Vols. I and V combine both narrative and appendix. "Worse" (sometimes translated as "worst") policy began as early as 1933. See Tokyo newspaper Asahi, February 27, 1933, in which the newspaper reported that Japan's withdrawal from the League of Nations had caused an increase in the spirit of war and "it is necessary for Japan to prepare for the worst." Reported in Proceedings (US Naval Institute, May 1933), p. 761.

24. See Hiroyuki Agawa, The Reluctant Admiral (Naval Institute Press. 1979), pp. 203 and 220 for Oikawa and Yamamoto.
25. For letter of Frank Knox to Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, see PHPT 4-1939. Warnings to Pearl Harbor started flowing immediately from Washington following the abrasive Oval Office luncheon with FDR and Admiral James Richardson. Three directives were dispatched by Admiral Harold Stark, the Chief of Naval Operations, to Rear Admiral Claude Bloch, Commandant of the Fourteenth Naval District (COM14) in Hawaii. Stark ordered improved air defenses to ward off a carrier air attack on Pearl Harbor. See Stark-Bloch dispatches of Oct. 9, 1940 (Serial 092135); Oct. 18, 1940 (Serial 182138), in RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II; and Stark to Bloch, Oct. 24, 1940, in PHPT 4-1939. On Dec. 30, 1940 Rear Admiral Bloch replied and agreed that aircraft attacking the base at Pearl Harbor would undoubtedly be brought by carriers. Bloch said the Japanese carriers would be repelled by (1) locating and destroying the ships, and (2) driving off the attacking planes with anti-aircraft fire; PHPT 33-1194.
26. All quotations here are from Max W. Bishop's letter to the author, Sept. 19, 1988, in author's file. A career State Department officer, Bishop arrived in Japan in 1935 and for a short time served as vice consul in Osaka. His five-year tour at an end, Bishop was under transfer to Washington, and was scheduled to depart via ocean liner at the end of January 1941—hence his money exchange efforts.

Bishop's written description of the meeting with Schreiber in the bank is contained in his letter to the author dated Sept. 19, 1988, in author's file. Japan prohibited two-way radio-wireless facilities in the American embassy. The most sensitive American government messages were encrypted in an "unbreakable code," then taken to the Japanese Telegraph Agency, which transmitted the messages to the radio facilities of the Fourth Marine Regiment in Shanghai, China, who then used Navy facilities to retransmit them to Washington. Japan's diplomatic missions in the United States used commercial firms such as RCA. Neither nation allowed the other radio transmitters. Each had the opportunity to read each other's mail, and did. On embassy radio facilities, see RG 38, Station US papers, SRH 355, Vol. 1, p. 347, MMRB, Archives II. On the "unbreakable" State Department code, see Joseph Grew's testimony PHPT 2, p. 582.

27. See the original copy of Grew's cablegram 125, as received by State Department at 6:38 A.M. on Monday, Jan. 27, 1941 (EST) in PHPT 14, p. 1042.
28. See Arthur McCollum dispatch, approved by Captain Jules James, interim ONI director, dictated Jan. 31, 1941 and transmitted to Admiral Kimmel on Feb. 1, 1941; confidential file, serial 09716, OP16-F-2 in RG 38, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II.
29. The exact time when message 301455 reached the White House is not clear. The six-digit number is the Navy's radio dispatch time recorded in Greenwich Mean Time, January 30, 1941 at 2:55 P.M. or 9:55 A.M. January 30 in Washington. Duane Whitlock, one of the traffic analysts at cast in January 1941, told the author he wrote the dispatch and that it was based entirely on analyzing the Japanese naval communication procedures culled from the message. "We were not reading the actual text at CAST," Whitlock said in a telephone interview with the author in May 1999, notes in author's file. The time frame suggests an afternoon delivery to the White House. See CAST report serial 301455, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II.

The CAST report was initialed by Captain Daniel J. Callaghan in Washington sometime after 9:55 A.M. EST. The White House Usher Book does not list Callaghan as a visitor on Jan. 30, 1941. The President remained in the second floor Oval Study until 11:22 A.M., then went to the Oval Office until 1:15 P.M., then to the Blue Parlor and State Dining Room for the movie-star luncheon. He returned to the Oval Office at 3:00 P.M., see the White House Usher Book, Jan. 30, 1941, FDRL.

30. For the Gallup Poll of Jan. 30, 1941, see NYT, Jan. 31, 1941.
31. See James O. Richardson, On The Treadmill to Pearl Harbor (Naval History Division, Department of the Navy, 1973), pp. 402, 403, 420. A sea bag is the naval equivalent of a suitcase.
32. Richardson's quote is from Richardson, Treadmill, p.7.
33. For Stark's quotes, "not commit one inch" and "looking for new job," see his January 13, 1941 letter to Kimmel in PHPT 16-2144.
34. For Anderson's promotion to the Pacific Fleet as the number three commander, see his Oral History in microfiche form, p. 235, Oral History Research Office, Butler Library, Columbia University, New York; for "stars to Ernie King" see ibid.
35. For Knox-Anderson discussion re reporters, see Anderson's OH, ibid.
36. For Thomason quote see Ladislav Farago, The Broken Seal (Random House, 1967), p. 102.
37. On Anderson meetings with FDR see his OH, p. 230.
38. See Adolf Berle's diary entry of Oct. 4, 1940, at FDRL, copy in author's file.
39. Anderson lends McCollum to Hoover as consultant, see FBI report 62-33413-766, FBI headquarters, FOIA section, Washington, DC.
40. Anderson knew nothing about the Roosevelt-Richardson meeting of October 8, 1940 according to his OH, pp. 246-247. His lack of knowledge concerning the Oval Office meeting might be explained by his credo, given in his OH, on p. 231: "An intelligence officer should not write books or discuss in any detailed way their professional activity."
41. See photograph of the change of command ceremony aboard USS Pennsylvania, in the photo insert herein.
42. For Richardson's "lips sealed," see Richardson, Treadmill, p. 436.
43. Richardson told Kimmel of a "disagreement" in PHPT 6-2619. On June 9, 1941 Kimmel met with FDR and told him the fleet was vulnerable in Hawaii, but did not protest its basing at Pearl; White House Usher Book, FDRL. Richardson had close personal ties to both Kimmel and Lieut. Gen. Walter Short but there is no record that he told them of the Oval Office confrontation of October 8, 1940. Richardson had ample opportunity to confide in Short. While the general awaited his furniture from the mainland, he and his wife were house guests of Richardson and his wife.

By naval tradition, command changes take place with incoming and outgoing officers reading their transfer orders to the assembled crew and invited guests. Battleship ceremonies were usually held on the fantail (rear deck of ship).

44. Anderson assumed title of Commander Battleships of the Pacific Fleet on January 31, 1941; see RG 24, Deck Log of USS West Virginia, Jan. 31, 1941, MMRB, Archives II. Anderson had changed his flagship to the USS Maryland by the time of the Pearl Harbor attack.
45. For Stark's, "The White House decides," see PHPT 16, pp. 2144-2146.
46. Stark "Our hand was forced," loc. cit.
47. For Richardson "little respect" quote, see Richardson, Treadmill, p. 7. See also ibid. p. 1, where Richardson objected to an FDR naval promotion slate of 1939 containing Anderson's name.
48. Anderson's address was 3671-A Diamond Head Road. He listed his telephone number as Honolulu 78450. See the Oahu telephone directory, fall 1941, p. 4. In 1996, his former residence still stood on the down slope toward the ocean.
49. Anderson commanded nine Pacific Fleet battleships. The USS Colorado was at Puget Sound Naval Yard, Seattle for overhaul and escaped the attack. The USS Utah, an ex-battleship, had been converted to an aerial target ship for training purposes.
50. On Anderson being home for the weekend and his return to his flagship Maryland at 0905 December 7, 1941, see Vice Admiral Homer N. Wallin, Pearl Harbor: Why, How, Fleet Salvage and Final Appraisal (Naval History Division, USGPO 1968), p. 153.
51. For Kimmel's "I may never understand," see Husband E. Kimmel, Admiral Kimmel's Story (Henry Regnery Company, 1955), p. 108. Shortly after Kimmel took command of the Pacific Fleet he questioned whether he was in the intelligence loop; see Kimmel, ibid. pp. 79 and 80.
52. For example of Purple Code messages intercepted at Fort Shafter, see Appendix F herein. See further discussion of the Purple Code in chapter 5.

53. For Kimmel to Stark, “no misunderstanding concerning intelligence,” see PHPT 4, p. 1792.

54. For Stark’s reply to Kimmel, see ibid.

55. For Kimmel’s “cardinal principle,” see loc. cit.

56. For US Navy ceasing to send decoded and translated Japanese intercepts acquired in Washington DC to Hawaii in July 1941, see testimony of Brigadier General Sherman Miles in PHPT 2, pp. 811, 812, 813. Station H on Oahu continued to intercept the Japanese navy’s 5-Num dispatches up to the attack, but apparently did not have the means to decrypt the message text during the period of July 15 to December 7, 1941. Officials at Station US controlled the decrypting information and saw to it that none leaked out until after December 7, 1941. In 1999, the argument cannot be settled on whether American cryptographers could intercept, decode, and translate the 5-Num code in a timely manner in 1941. There is no way to prove or disprove the argument for the original coded intercepts obtained by Station H, and the decoding procedures necessary to unmask the Japanese text have not been publicly released. The author believes such an argument is moot for the answers to the argument are entirely clear. Officials in Washington did not want the Hawaiian commanders, Admiral Kimmel and General Short, to independently learn of Japan’s plans to attack Hawaii and derail a clear-cut overt act of war by the Japanese.

1. For McCollum's memo on actions B and G, see Appendix A of this book.
2. See Dr. H. J. van Mook, The Netherlands East Indies and Japan (London: George Allen & Unwin Ltd., 1944), p. 43 ff.
3. For Dr. van Mook's "preposterous" and Netherlands role as "supervisory" comments, see van Mook, ibid. p. 46.
4. For the October 16, 1940 Purple intercept routed to FDR, see RG 38, Station US papers in MMRB, Archives II. Reproduced in Appendix F of this book.
5. See Admiral James O. Richardson's account concerning the question of war that he posed to FDR in PHPT 1, p. 266; see also James O. Richardson, On the Treadmill to Pearl Harbor (Naval History Division USGPO. 1973), p. 427.
6. For a copy of the October 30, 1940 intercept delivered by Arthur McCollum to Ranneft see RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. Notation on the report: "By D.N.I. (Director Naval Intelligence, Capt. Walter S. Anderson) order, above handed to Capt. Ranneft 2100, 30 Oct. by McC." "Johan Ranneft was an experienced naval communications officer and would have understood the American techniques of acquiring the Japanese intercept." He was Director of Dutch Naval Communications 1934–38. He served in the United States as naval attaché from 1938–1947. Ranneft was born in Semarang, Java, Jan. 25, 1886, and died in Houston, Texas, January 20, 1982. USN intelligence reports based on Japanese naval intercepts were funneled to McCollum. He had two assistants, Major Rodney A. Boone, a US Marine Corps intelligence officer, and Lieutenant Commander Ethelbert Watts, a Japanese-language expert and a close friend of Joseph Rochefort, commander of Station HYPO. Starting in mid-November 1941, McCollum's F-2 operation alternated on eight-hour shifts around the clock forwarding the latest intelligence information to President Roosevelt and other American government leaders.
7. The American government has never publicly admitted to the exchange of pre-Pearl Harbor Japanese intercepted messages in the military and diplomatic codes with the Dutch and British governments. For confirmation of US exchange of Japanese intercepts with British and Dutch, see a letter dated November 8, 1941 from Knox to Hull, Secret serial 038513 in RG 38, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II. In 1941 the Dutch Navy assigned Commander H. D. Linder as COMINT liaison to Admiral Hart's staff in Manila, according to Hart's biographer, James Leutze, in A Different Kind of Victory (Naval Institute Press. 1981), pp. 199, 251, 252, 253. Batavia (Jakarta), the capital of the Dutch East Indies, was a major pre-Pearl Harbor source of US intelligence concerning Japan. Direct liaison between Batavia and Washington, DC was effected through the US Army's military attaché and the USN's naval attaché. Both officers were given access to Japanese diplomatic and military messages obtained by Dutch cryptographers who maintained an intercept facility at a Netherlands army post at Bandoeng, Java, under the cover name Kamer 14. A Purple Code machine was used in Batavia by the Japanese consul-general for communication with Tokyo and other diplomatic posts. Documents in the Station US papers indicate that Dutch officials in Batavia solved the Japanese naval operations code (the 5-Num code) and shared the information with Washington. Reciprocal intelligence exchanges were accorded Captain Johan Ranneft, the Dutch naval attaché in Washington. Most Pearl Harbor historians assert that communications intelligence (COMINT) was a closely guarded secret disseminated only to a select list of high American government officials. The Station US papers in Archives II include documents labeled "1941 Netherlands raw traffic in the MH and NH Code," stored in Box 792. The documents have not been declassified as of the writing of this book in 1999.
8. On the FDR meeting with van Kleffens, see White House Usher Book for March 19, 1941, FDRL. Quote from van Kleffens is in Knickerbocker Weekly, March 31, 1941, pp. 12–13. Another agenda was on the Dutch minister's mind: He pressured Assistant Secretary of State Breckenridge Long, requesting that an LL.D degree be conferred on Netherlands Crown Princess Juliana by Princeton University; Long was an influential board member of the University. See Breckenridge Long, War Diary of Breckenridge Long (University of Nebraska Press 1966), p. 191.
9. For Abend's account, see Hallett Abend, Japan Unmasked (Ives Washburn, Inc. 1941), p. 142.
10. For Ranneft's diary accounts of December 2 and 6, 1941 see Johan E. M. Ranneft. Dagboek (Diary) 1938–1947. (The Hague Institute for Maritime History, Ministry of Defense, 1952), p. 39. For Ranneft's visit to ONI on December 2 and 6, 1941, see John Toland, Infamy (Doubleday & Company, Inc.), pp. 282, 298. A copy of Ranneft's diary was supplied to the author by Dr. P. C. van Royen, Director, Institute for Maritime History, on July 7, 1995; copy is in author's file.
11. For tracking Japanese Carrier Divisions Three and Four from Sasebo to the Southeast Asia/Palau (sometimes spelled as Palao by the navy cryptographers) region, and their continued association with the Third Fleet—not commander carriers—see Station H’s daily Chronology for November 1–30, 1941 in Station US papers, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II, copies in author’s file. The aircraft carrier HIMJS Taiyo was identified as the Kasuga Maru in the prewar Station H intercepts. The Kasuga Maru, a luxury passenger liner of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha (Known as the NYK Line or Japanese Steamship Company) was converted to an aircraft carrier during 1941 and that fall was commissioned as a 17,000-ton flattop. Since the conversion included the former liner’s radio transmitters, USN cryptographers recognized her radio transmissions as that of the former luxury liner.

Note: For Japanese accounts on composition of Carrier Divisions Three and Four conflict, see Ikuhiko Hata, Japanese Naval Aces (Naval Institute Press, 1989). Taiyo was torpedoed and sunk by USS Rasher on August 18, 1944.

12. In Dutch: “2-12-41. Bespreking op Navy Dept. men wijst mij op de kaart de plaats van 2 Japanese carriers uit Japan vertrokken met Oostelijke koers.” The Netherlands Government provided two conflicting English translations for the author. Both agree that the two carriers were proceeding in an easterly direction from Japan. The conflict centers on the specific location of the departure of the Japanese carriers. A translation by the Netherlands consulate in San Francisco reads: “I was being shown the place on the map where the two Japanese carriers departed on an eastern course.” A slightly different nuance—but with same meaning—appeared in a translation that the Ministry of Defense at The Hague prepared for the author. Translators at The Hague dropped “the place” and came up with: “Meeting at Navy Department, the location of two Japanese carriers leaving Japan with eastern course are pointed out to me on the map.” The words “the place,” “eastern,” and “easterly” are critical here. A look at the map indicates that of the two, Sasebo or Hitokappu Bay, the latter is “the place” that offers a direct eastern (or easterly) departure. Asked by the author to clarify his Japanese carrier research concerning Ranneft, Toland wrote that Ranneft was referring to Japanese carriers, not Carrier Divisions. See Toland to author, July 19, 1995.
13. For Yamamoto’s first dispatch see two sources: (1) Wallin, Pearl Harbor, p. 87; (2) Captain F. M. Trapnell, USN, Captain J. S. Russell, USN, and Lieutenant Commander J. A. Field, Jr., USNR, eds., The Campaigns of the Pacific War (United States Strategic Bombing Survey, Naval Analysis Division, USGPO Washington, 1946), p. 50.
14. For Yamamoto’s second dispatch, see Wallin, Pearl Harbor, p. 86, Campaigns, supra. The Wallin version is reproduced in Appendix D of this book.
15. Vice Admiral Homer N. Wallin headed the US Navy’s Pearl Harbor salvage operations, refloating battleships and other vessels sunk on December 7, 1941. The US Strategic Bombing Survey was established by President Roosevelt on November 3, 1944. Its original mission was to survey effects of aerial bombing on Germany. On August 15, 1945, President Harry Truman requested that the Survey conduct a similar study of the aerial bombing of Japan. Truman named eleven directors headed by Franklin D’Olier, chairman. The other members were Paul H. Nitze, Walter Wilds, Harry L. Bowman, J. K. Galbraith, Rensis Likert, Frank A. McNamee, Fred Searls, Jr., Monroe Spaght, Dr. Louis R. Thompson, and Theodore P. Wright.
16. Yamamoto’s thirteen missing radio messages can easily be documented by retrieving his SMS message numbers from the intercept file of Station H in RG 45, MMRB, of Archives II. Every Japanese naval commander, warship, and unit assigned a separate consecutive Secret Message Series (SMS) number to each radio dispatch they originated. It began at 001, advanced to 999, then repeated the sequence. Depending upon the number of dispatches, several series of 1000 messages could be issued per year for each command, etc. The author analyzed Yamamoto’s message time frame in the Station H records. On November 24, 1941 at 1:00 P.M. Tokyo Time, he dispatched a fleet radio message using his call sign, RO SE 22. He numbered the message as 606 in the SMS Series. The next thirteen Yamamoto messages have disappeared from records released by the United States government. He reappears in SMS 620 which the admiral dispatched at 3:54 P.M., November 26, Tokyo Time, according to the Station H records. Again Yamamoto used his radio call sign of RO SE 22. (Prior to Pearl Harbor, a double-digit number always designated a commanding officer in Japanese naval dispatches.)

Obviously there are thirteen messages missing from the Yamamoto radio dispatch records of Station H—the principal US Navy monitoring unit for the Pacific Fleet. The missing dispatches include his explosive messages directing the carrier force to advance through the Northern Pacific and bomb Pearl Harbor. So where are the missing thirteen messages? Captain Homer Kisner, radio traffic chief for the Pacific Fleet in 1941, also wonders. He was in charge of the US Navy’s intercept operations at Station H. In interviews with the author in 1988 and 1998, Kisner said his intercept operators rarely missed Japanese naval radio messages. “Even if some messages were missed during the first transmission, Japan’s navy always repeated messages and we could obtain them on the second or third dispatch,” Kisner told the author. Kisner said he and his men carefully monitored the SMS numbers: “We didn’t want to miss a one.”

Intercepted Japanese naval dispatches of the pre-Pearl Harbor era (July 15–December 7, 1941) are housed in MMRB at Archives II, College Park, Maryland as Record Group (RG) 457. They were released to National Archives by President Jimmy Carter’s Executive Order 12065 of June 1, 1979 and labeled Special Research Navy (SRN).

Yamamoto's SMS 606 is filed as SRN 116780; 620 is SRN 117266 (SRN number is listed here as a finding aid, it has nothing to do with sequence of the messages). According to John Taylor, supervising archivist of RG 457 at Archives II, the thirteen missing Yamamoto radio dispatches, SMS 607 to SMS 619, were not released to the National Archives. The National Security Agency, at Fort George G. Meade, Maryland carried out President Carter's order. Before releasing the Japanese radio documents to the National Archives, NSA blacked out all reference to the 5-Num code. Some First Amendment scholars call the blackouts censorship; NSA refers to them as redactions. There are approximately 2,600 pre-Pearl Harbor Japanese naval intercepts mixed haphazardly together with about 300,000 intercepts of the Pacific War. The 2600 figure represents about 2 percent of the Japanese naval intercepts obtained by Station H operators between July 15 and December 7, 1941. Station H intercept operators intercepted about 1,000 Japanese naval messages per day in the pre-Pearl Harbor period, which, according to Kisner, totaled about 140,000 intercepts. The 2,600 intercepts released to the American public are not arranged chronologically, but mixed together, requiring a researcher to separate the pre-Pearl Harbor records from the lot. See the pre-Pearl Harbor intercepts—arranged in chronological order, in the author's file. All Japanese naval intercepts and radio logs monitored by American facilities were recorded in Tokyo Time. Japan's naval units used Tokyo Time no matter where they were located in the world.

17. As of 1999, the Kurile Islands are controlled by the Russian government. Etorofu is called Ostrov Iturup. For coded movement reports of Japanese warships en route to Hitokappu Bay in November 1941, see the SRN documents in RG 457, MMRB, Archives II. The SRN documents in RG 457 indicate they were "trans" in 1945 and 1946.
18. During 1941 apparently 90 percent of the Japanese navy's coded movement reports were decoded and translated in Washington at Station US, according to an article written by US Navy cryptologist Captain Al Pelletier in Cryptolog, Summer 1992 issue, p. 5. But Duane Whitlock, a 1941 radio traffic analyst at Station CAST (the US Navy's cryptographic center for the US Asiatic Fleet on Corregidor island) said in a telephone interview with the author that his unit was not provided the means to decode Japan's ship movement code. "If Washington was reading Japan's ship movement code in 1941, that's news to me," Whitlock said in the interview. "We did not have the solution to the ship movement code at CAST" (Whitlock telephone interview, June 1999, notes in author's file). For Japanese radio orders directing warships to standby locations, see the Special Research Navy (SRN) file in RG 457, and the Daily Chronology of Station H, dated Nov. 15–30, 1941 in RG 38, MMRB, at Archives II. The reader is reminded that the English text in the SRN translations contained in RG 457 was "trans" in 1945 and 1946; the original intercepts were obtained in 1941. There is no reliable evidence, found by the author, that establishes how much of the 5-Num text could be deciphered, translated, and read by naval cryptographers in 1941.
19. For Layton's testimony that Japanese "carriers were never heard," see PHPT 10, pp. 4839 ff.
20. "The British "heard," see discussion throughout James Rusbridger, Betrayal at Pearl Harbor (Summit Books, 1991) ff.
21. Dutch heard and located Japanese warships "near Kuriles," see letter of Lieut. Gen. Hein ter Poorten, Commander of Netherlands East Indies Forces, dated July 23, 1960, Royal Netherlands Army Archives, The Hague; copy in author's file.
22. For Rochefort's report of a "large-scale screening maneuver," see his Communication Summary of Oct. 22, 1941, p. 2, in RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II. He said the maneuver would be eastward from the Kuriles. The Hawaiian Islands, Canada, and the United States lie eastward from the Kuriles. Rochefort's term "screening maneuver" is a military phrase that means to eliminate your enemy. It is a tactic similar to one used in football games, where the linemen protect the quarterback from charging opponents and screen them out by tackling them. "High-north" radio circuits meant north of Hokkaido to Horomushiru, a.k.a. Paramushiru.
23. For Admiral Harold Stark's testimony on Hitokappu Bay, see PHPT 5, p. 2253.
24. After analyzing a copy of the HITOKAPPU BAY intercept sent to him by the author in June 1999, Duane Whitlock, the radio traffic analyst at Station CAST, told the author in a telephone interview that he did not believe that Japan's naval radio transmitted the words HITOKAPPU BAY in plain Japanese as is noted on the United States version of the translated dispatch printed herein. "If the dispatch contained the words HITOKAPPU WAN (in actual transmission the Japanese word "wan"—for bay or harbor—would have been used) I would have spotted the security breach, realized the significance, and sounded the alarm bell" (Whitlock to author, telephone interview June 1999, notes in author's file).
25. For opposite view, see note 24 above.
26. The suffix 58 used in RI TA 358 was Japan's naval radio code for "chief of staff" it never changed prior to December 7, 1941. See Station H Code Movement reports for November 1941 and decryptions of Japanese naval call signs (Yobidashi Fugo). For the censored version, see RG 457, SRN files, MMRB, Archives II; uncensored version is in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. The SMS number that appears on most Japanese intercepts obtained by Station H refers to Secret Message Series. The SMS number, or Secret Message Series, was included within each 5-Num code message transmitted by Japan's navy in 1941. The SMS number was in the clear—meaning not encrypted. According to Homer Kisner, the traffic chief at Station H, the SMS number enabled the cryptographers to track the major Japanese commanders such as Admiral Isoroku Yamamoto, the commander-in-chief of the Imperial Japanese Navy, and Vice Admiral Chuichi Nagumo, the commander of Japan's carrier force, the First Air Fleet. Yamamoto had his own SMS series, so did Nagumo, according to Kisner. (Author interview with Kisner April 1988, Carlsbad, California and April 1999, Sacramento, California; 1988 audio tape, transcript, photographs, follow-up written correspondence, notes; 1999 video tape interview, transcript, photographs, notes, in author's file.)

With Kisner's help in 1988, the author prepared an SMS analysis of Admiral Nagumo's daily radio messages in the SMS series for September through November 1941. The analysis is based on the 5-Num intercepts found by the author in RG 457, MMRB, Archives II. Nagumo's use of radio as he prepared his carriers for the journey toward Hawaii is dramatic evidence. In September 1941 he originated 2.8 radio messages per day. By November it was 14.8 messages per day, an increase of over 400 percent. See SMS analysis in author's file, also available from analysis of RG 457 at Archives II.

27. See the TESTM records for November and December 1941, in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. RDF "fixes" must be recorded and evaluated on a Great Circle chart for accuracy. A TESTM report is reproduced in Appendix D of this book.
28. On November 1, 1941 the Japanese navy issued radio call list 9 (Yobidashi Fugo), which completely changed all warship radio identities. For IJN radio call sign list 9, see SRN 117402 of September 3, 1941 in RG 457, Archives II; for Hawaii super radio call sign list see PHLO files, RG 80, MMRB, Archives II. Aware that USN cryptographers might solve list 9 and discover the warships headed for Pearl Harbor, the IJN prepared a second super secret list for vessels assigned to the Hawaii operation. The TESTM records disclose that the USN cryptographers at Station CAST solved portions of the Hawaii call list code prior to December 7, 1941. The super list was recovered from a downed Japanese aircraft on December 7, 1941 and proved CAST's solutions were correct. The shore-based Japanese high naval commands used a three-kana radio call sign that did not change at least through December 7, 1941. Example: the Chief of the Naval General Staff, Admiral Osami Nagano's call sign was KO ME HA, according to Station H records in RG 38, Station US files, MMRB, Archives II.
29. For further details on American cryptographers obtaining Japan's secret Hawaii radio call signs, see the TESTM reports in chapters 8, 9, 11, 12, and 13, herein.
30. For identifying spurious sounds emitted by Japanese naval radio transmitters, see interview between Robert Ogg and Commander Irwin G. Newman, SRH 255, pp.31 to 34, RG 457, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file; for "very easy to identify Japanese naval radio transmitters," see letter from Fred Thomson, radioman-in-charge at Station AE, Sitka, Territory of Alaska in 1941, to author dated January 29, 1986, p. 4, item h; p.11, item i; in author's file; see telephone discussion of June 30, 1999, between author and Robert Ogg concerning spurious sounds emitted by Japanese naval radio transmitters, notes in author's file. See also comments by Robert Fox, radioman-in-charge, Station KING, Dutch Harbor, Territory of Alaska, where he could distinguish Russian radio transmitters by their "hollow sound"; Station KING, monthly report, November 1941, RG 181, National Archives, Seattle, WA, copy in author's file.
31. Homer Kisner interviews, April 1988 and April 1998, author's files.
32. Ibid.
33. The Underwood code typewriter was officially known as Radio Intelligence Publication 5, or "RIP 5" by the US Navy because of the published instructions for its operation. It converted signals of the International Morse Code (IMC) to the Japanese naval kata kana telegraphic code. Laurance Safford and Joseph Rochefort, cofounders of Navy communications intelligence, persuaded John Underwood, president of the typewriter firm, to manufacture the special code typewriter in the mid-1920s. Later, Underwood developed code typewriters for Russian, German, and Italian intercepts. The typewriters cost the Navy $85 each. The RIPs were secret documents issued by Station US and contained decryption information on Japanese radio and cryptographic procedures. As an example when Station US broke the 1918 Japanese naval code it was published as RIP 2. A later revision became RIP 3. The IJN operations code (5-Num) was first published in 1941 as RIP 73 and RIP 80. See SRH 355, Vols. I and II, in RG 457, and RIP 32 in Station US files, MMRB, at Archives II.
34. See Joseph Rochefort's Oral History (ROH) p. 99, supra; also Laurance Safford: "The best we had as far as experience and all-around skill was up at Pearl Harbor," PHPT 8-3560.
35. During interviews with the author in 1988 and 1998, Kisner said some historians—who never interviewed him—had misinterpreted his Daily Chronology, in which he said there was no change in carrier operations during the three week period the Pearl Harbor force assembled and headed for Hawaii. These historians interpreted Kisner's words

“no change” to mean that the Navy had lost the carrier force destined for Hawaii. Kisner explained that “no change” meant that there was no Japanese communication intelligence which changed the operations of the “Carrier Divisions” with the cruiser Tone and the twelve ships of the destroyer squadron. “These warships remained together as a force throughout the period and never separated. That’s what ‘no change’ means,” Kisner said. See: Homer Kisner interview, author’s file. For the Thanksgiving report of Carrier Commands and Divisions, see the Station H Chronology, November 20, 1941 in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II.

Kisner had two radio direction finders at his disposal. One was on the H property near the beach front on Kaneohe Bay, the other at the Lualualei Naval Radio Station on the northwest coast of Oahu. Additional bearings were obtained from RDF stations at Corregidor, Guam, Dutch Harbor, Samoa, Midway, and the West Coast Communications Intelligence Network. Station H property was acquired by the Navy from the Federal Telegraph Company, a firm originally engaged in trans-Pacific radio/telegraph operations.

36. English translations of the four Japanese naval broadcasts are found in RG 457 (for blacked out version), MMRB, Archives II, and RG 38, Station US papers, ibid, for uncensored version. (1) Plain language Hitokappu Bay SRN 116643; (2) For IJN submarine RO TU ØØ (Ø designates the number zero in radio telegraphy, O, letter) see SRN 117666, (3) for I-19, see SRN 11632, and (4) TAYU 88 see SRN 117675. Uncensored in RG 38, ibid. USN radio intercept operators placed their sine—a two initial identification—on each document. See Station H operator sine list, July 1941, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. Sines SN and LF are unidentified as this book is being written.
37. Kisner would have warned Kimmel, Homer Kisner interview, Sacramento, CA, April 24, 1998, transcript, notes in author’s files.
38. Britain’s Japanese code-breaking unit the Far East Combined Bureau at Singapore also intercepted and reported the radio transmissions to Winston Churchill, according to Captain Eric Nave, RN in his (with co-author James Rusbridger) Betrayal at Pearl Harbor (Summit Books, 1991), pp.137 ff. For letter of Secretary of Navy Frank Knox to Secretary of State Cordell Hull, see note 7, this chapter, supra.
39. Though Netherlands military forces in the Dutch East Indies destroyed the 1941 Japanese navy and diplomatic intercept files, copies may still exist. It appears that the Dutch intercepts shared with the American government by Ranneft and Kamer 14 have been preserved in the Station US papers in Archives II. An index or finders aid is part of the Station US papers and describes the contents of Box 792: “Netherlands Raw Intercepts of 1941,” but includes no details. Censorship has prevented the author’s access as of this writing; see copy of index in author’s file.
40. For Ranneft’s 100 percent quote, see Note 10 herein.

1. On the “splendid arrangement,” see testimony of Admiral Harold Stark, FDR’s Chief of Naval Operations, in discussion with Senator Walter George (D., GA) re intercepted Japanese messages in PHPT 5, p. 2213.
2. For monitor stations and cryptographic control center locations, see map in this book at the start.
3. For the early history of American communications intelligence, see SRH 355, in RG 457, MMRB, Archives II; also Herbert O. Yardley, The American Black Chamber (Bobbs-Merrill, 1931).
4. On Rochefort, see Joseph Rochefort’s Oral History (ROH), pp. 4 ff. In 1970, a bound volume of The Reminiscences of Captain Joseph J. Rochefort was published by the United States Naval Institute, Annapolis, Maryland as part of their Oral History interview program. The interview was conducted by US Navy Commander Etta Belle Kitchen in 1969 and immediately classified as TOP SECRET CODEWORD by Naval Intelligence. When the author learned of its existence in 1983 he filed a FOIA request but the Navy refused to declassify. Naval censorship was bypassed when Rochefort’s daughter Janet Rochefort Elerding made the manuscript available. Joseph Rochefort died in 1979.
5. Station US, the small cryptographic unit cofounded by Safford and Rochefort, has been known by several designations. In 1935 it was called the Communications Security Group. During World War II, as space requirements for the cryptographic operations expanded, the Navy purchased the Mount Vernon Seminary at 3801 Nebraska Avenue, N.W. in Washington, DC and renamed the former school campus and buildings as Station NEGAT (for Nebraska). The unit has gone through a series of name changes since World War II, and has moved to Fort George G. Meade, Maryland, where it is known as the Naval Security Group Command. For more details, see A History of Communications Intelligence in the United States with Emphasis on The United States Navy (Eugene, OR: Naval Cryptologic Veterans Association, 1982).
6. For history of Station CAST, see booklet, “Intercept Station C” (Naval Cryptologic Veterans Association, 1983). Lietwiler was scheduled to relieve Fabian in the fall of 1941, but due to the crisis both remained at CAST. Three other facilities contributed to the “splendid arrangement” at CAST: Station BAKER, an RDF station at Libugon, Guam; the FECB at Singapore; and Kamer 14 at Bandoeng, Java. See SRH 045 dated August 4, 1945, in RG 457, MMRB, Archives II, for limited information on Station SIX written by Lt. Col. Howard Brown, the noncommissioned officer-in-charge in 1941. Brown wrote that he personally delivered Japanese intercepts to MacArthur, and received a “Thank you, Son”; but Brown provides no details on the contents of the intercepts seen by the general. For US Navy decryption results at CAST, see John Lietwiler’s memo in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II.
7. For US sharing Japanese communications with the British and the Dutch governments, see Note 6 above.
8. See ROH, pp. 25, 106, for Joseph Rochefort’s intelligence credo.
9. See ibid., p. 100.
10. See Fourteenth Naval District Secret A-6-3 file, RG 181, NA, San Bruno. The reference to Lt. Gen. Walter Short’s letter of Thursday, November 27, 1941, is in the naval routing slip received of COM 14, November 28; it bears Rochefort’s initials, JJR. COM 14 was a cover name for Station HYPO in 1941. The second letter is in the same file dated January 1, 1942. Presumably the originals are in the Station US files at Archives II.
11. For Barkley’s exchange with Gen. Short, see PHPT 7-3013. Emily Short, the general’s daughter-in-law, said his treatment by the Army broke his heart and he was unable to present a spirited defense due to ill health. Telephone conversation with author, February 25, 1997, notes, transcript in author’s file.
12. Assistant Secretary of State Adolf Berle, Jr., a principal advisor to FDR, arranged for the exchange of communications intelligence between Canadian WT (wireless/telegraph) stations and SAIL. See Berle to Knox, confidential memorandum July 21, 1941 in COM 13 file EF 13-39, RG 181, NA, Seattle.
13. For Oshima disclosing Hitler’s Russian invasion plans, see Oshima message number 691 to Tokyo, Saturday, June 14, 1941, in The Magic Background of Pearl Harbor, Vol. II, p. A-335, item 659. See also ibid. item 660 of June 18, 1941. Presumably Oshima’s message was delivered to the White House by FDR’s naval aide Captain John Beardall, who saw Roosevelt at 11:18 A.M., on June 14, per White House Usher Book, FDRL. Beardall delivered intercepts to the President from mid-May 1941 to the time of Pearl Harbor.
14. David Kahn, The Codebreakers (Macmillan, 1967) and Cipher A. Deavours, Machine Cryptography (Artech House, 1985) are worth reading on cryptography theory. A formula offered by Deavours for partially solving Purple: cS2 bS1 = dS2 cS1 = aS2 dS1 = bS2. For an example of an original Purple intercept see RG 38, Station US files, folder 5830/75, MMRB, Archives II. It was intercepted at Station FIVE, Fort Shafter, Hawaii on May 6, 1941, and

- forwarded by teleprinter to Washington, where it was initialed AHM by Arthur H. McCollum.
15. For the quote from Rear Admiral Leigh Noyes, see PHPT 10, p. 4714. On Colonel William Friedman's first purple decryption, see Ronald Clark, The Man Who Broke Purple (Little, Brown and Co., 1977), p. 144. The Japanese called the Purple machine Obun Injiki or electric typewriter. In the Pacific area, Japan issued Purple machines to its consulates in Manila, Hong Kong, Singapore, and Batavia, but not Honolulu. Pearl Harbor investigators were told that the Purple code was unknown to Hawaii's military officials in 1941, but the Station US papers prove otherwise. Lt. Cdr. Thomas Dyer, chief Navy cryptanalyst at Pearl Harbor's Station HYPO, wrote that he had received a descriptive write-up of the Purple system but was not provided with the necessary equipment for processing the messages between November 27 and December 7, 1941; Dyer is quoted by Rear Admiral Earl E. Stone in Top Secret Ultra Serial 0003048P20 of April 6, 1946, in RG 38, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II. Station US published secret instructions for operation of the Purple machine and its decoding techniques and sent them to the Pacific intercept stations, including Station HYPO, as Radio Intelligence Publication 77 (instructions). RIP 72—the prototype Purple machine—was not sent to Hawaii. Mysteriously, RIP 72 is missing from two RIP indices found by the author in the Station US papers, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II. At the request of the author, Cary Conn of the Archives FOIA staff began an investigation concerning the missing RIP 72 in September 1998.
 16. See David Kahn, Codebreakers, supra, ff.
 17. See Ensign Laurance MacKallor's handwritten note: "Facts concerning the 'Purple' machine as nearly as I can recall them," initialed LLM, in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II.
 18. For Safford's dispatches listing the Purple sequence settings see OPNAV to COM SIXTEEN (CAST), Secret serial 060720, December 6, 1941; RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. At the end of the European War, British cryptographers seized a Purple machine found at the Japanese embassy in Berlin. According to MacKallor's note, CAST personnel destroyed the Purple machine in April 1942; but he gave no details. Robert Dowd and Duane Whitlock, who worked in the cryptographic tunnel at Station CAST in 1941 and 1942, told the author that the Purple machine was transported to Australia by a US Navy submarine in April 1942, when Japanese troops were about to seize Corregidor. Telephone interviews May 1999. In his telephone interview with the author, Dowd said he operated the Purple machine for the US Navy at CAST. At the time he was a yeoman second class assigned to the machine area of the cryptographic tunnel (see drawing of CAST in photo insert). Dowd said he received the encrypted Purple message from an intercept operator and then began the decryption process. First he set the rotor wheels for the correct sequence, then ran the message through the machine, which stripped off the encryption and produced plain Japanese text in Roman letters. Next he took the deciphered message to a Japanese-language officer, Lieutenant Commander S. A. Carlson, for translating to English. "I was never told of the contents of the Purple messages," Dowd said. "I didn't qualify under the need to know doctrine. So I never saw an English translation." Telephone conversations with author, May 1999. Dowd retired from the US Navy as a lieutenant commander.
 19. For "within a day's time," see Safford testimony in PHPT 36, p. 67; also Lt. John Lietwiler's memo in Station US papers, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II. Lietwiler was co-commander of CAST from September 1941 until his evacuation from Corregidor in 1942.
 20. On courier Fukuda, see PHPT 35-442; Magic, Vol. I, p. A-92, item 161. Twenty-one ports of call are listed including Los Angeles, New York, Washington, DC, plus cities in Central and South America.
 21. See report of the Yawata $40,000 transaction written by Lt. Ellsworth Hosmer, DIO, COM 12, author's file, courtesy of his daughter, Patty Hosmer Rathbone, Loomis, CA.
 22. A striking example of a US naval officer concealing British and American success in obtaining and solving Japanese code systems in 1941 can be found in the Station US records at Archives II. The concealment concerns elements of the Japanese navy's operations code, known as the 5-Num or 5-Digit code. On March 5, 1941, Captain Joseph Redman, assistant director of naval communications, ordered that a radio dispatch sent by Admiral Thomas Hart, commander-in-chief of the Asiatic Fleet, be withdrawn from US Navy files and a dummy substituted in its place. In the secret message that Redman wanted withdrawn, Admiral Hart disclosed he was exchanging solutions of the 5-Num code with the British naval cryptology agency, the Far East Combined Bureau (FECB) at Singapore. "Combined" referred to Australian, New Zealand, and British officers working together. See Hart's message, secret serial 050535, March 5, 1941 in enclosure 2, FOIA release by Naval Security Group Command to author, August 31, 1993, in author's file. The Chinese government of Chiang Kai-shek may have been a part of the "splendid arrangement." Documents found by the author in Archives II, indicate that Chinese cryptographers solved Japan's 1941 military and diplomatic codes. American censorship in 1999 hides full details. Documents in Archives II provide a look at Chinese code-breaking success. On August 29, 1941, the British cryptology center in Singapore asked its air attaché in Chungking to obtain Japanese naval codes from Chinese cryptographers. According to the British, Chinese code-breakers had broken into the Imperial Japanese Navy's coded message texts (5-Num), radio frequencies, and coded call signs (Yobidashi Fugo) of the Japanese Naval Air Forces. See RG 38, Station US papers, SRH 406, Box 13, Folder 5830/115 MMRB, Archives II. But beware—avoid the sanitized version of SRH 406 in the so-called “open” file of RG 457 in Archives II. The true message is in the Station US papers. The reference to China breaking the Japanese codes is whited out in the “open” file. However, by holding the Aug. 29, 1941, whited out message to a light source a researcher can read the censored version. See also messages from the US Naval Attaché in Chungking (Chiang’s wartime capital) for Sept. 11, Oct. 26 and 30, and Dec. 10, 1941. These four reports confirm that China had broken Japanese military codes. The September 11 message identifies Japanese Naval Air Groups 12, 13, and 15 and ties in with the earlier Singapore report. See folder containing Chungking USN attaché reports in RG 38, Station US papers, Archives II.

23. For a description of the Japanese naval code systems used in the Pacific War, see Kanya Miyauchi. Niitaka Yama Nobore (Climb Mount Niitaka) (Tokyo. Rikkyu Shuppan. 1976) pp. 135ff. Author’s translation provided through courtesy of Commander Sadao Seno (Retired) of the Imperial Japanese Navy. For the US Navy’s description of the Japanese navy code systems prior to November 1941, see RG 38, RIP 32, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. For Canada’s WT (wireless/telegraph) Plan, see SECRET letter dated August 2, 1941 from HMC Dockyard Esquimalt, B.C., Canada to COM 13, in Folder EF13-39, Box 8155, RG 181, NA, Seattle, WA. See Note 6, supra.
24. In April 1943, American cryptographers learned of a Yamamoto inspection trip to bases in the South Pacific. The “unbreakable code” revealed his itinerary. American fighters were dispatched to the route and shot down the admiral’s aircraft. The plane crashed, killing Yamamoto.
25. Re Duane Whitlock: Whitlock’s e-mail to author, May 22, 1999, in author’s file. Re Admiral Thomas Hart, “Most of those dispatches that came in were kept very closely locked up, and I believe that Admiral Hart was about the only one who saw them, other than those that were doing the decrypting,” Adair said in an oral history that was conducted in 1977 (hereafter referred to as Adair Oral History, AOH: See Reminiscences of Rear Admiral Charles Adair, US Naval Institute, 1977).

Q. But it was known that we were breaking the code.

ADAIR: They were, yes. As far as Washington knew, they knew everything that was going on at the time, that is, what the Japs were saying. (AOH p. 73).

Adair expanded on USN decoding procedures available to Admiral Hart from Station CAST and said that President Roosevelt was reading the Japanese intercepts: “I believe that the war was inevitable. It had to be because I think President Roosevelt was bound and determined we were going to get into the war somehow. He had been unable to get our ships in the Atlantic attacked by the Germans. He was reading all the Japanese coded dispatches (AOH p. 76). Adair said Hart never confided in him but still conveyed the inevitable that we were going to get into this war, because of the dispatches he saw. “He (Hart) was getting dispatches and reading a lot of material that I don’t think Washington knew he was getting at the time, because he did have some of those decoding machines which, I found out later, the Commander-in-Chief Pacific Fleet (Admiral Kimmel) did not have.” (AOH p. 77). One of the decoding machines included JEEP IV used for solving the additive versions of Japan’s naval code known to Americans as the 5-Num system. The JEEP IV decoding machine was brought to CAST by Lieutenant (j.g.) John W. Hess in early October 1941, according to a secret memo prepared by Lieutenant John Lietwiler, co-commander of CAST. See SRH 355, p. 433, in RG 457, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author’s file.

For other confirmation on Washington’s ability to read the intercepted Japanese military and diplomatic messages, see General George Marshall’s statement to selected Washington, DC newsmen on November 15, 1941. In his meeting with the reporters, Marshall disclosed that the United States had broken Japanese codes and that he expected war with Japan would begin during the first ten days of December 1941; for full discussion see chapter 10 herein.

26. The author located 210 SM reports in the Station US files of RG 457, MMRB, Archives II. These, however, are apparently only a small portion of the SM reports obtained by Station H in 1941.
27. See Rudolph Fabian’s original report of November 29, 1941, transmitted to Station US and Admiral Kimmel in Hawaii; converted to Presidential Monograph 70, RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II. The monograph is signed by Major R. A. Boone, a McCollum assistant. None of the original intercepted Japanese radio messages of Admiral Kondo, cited by Fabian, have been declassified and released to the public by Archives II. During a telephone interview with the author in May 1999, Captain Duane Whitlock (a radioman first class assigned to CAST in 1941) said that he wrote most of the intelligence dispatches sent to Hawaii and Washington in 1941. Whitlock denied that cryptographers at CAST had deciphered the SM code as suggested in Pelletier’s article. “I was one of three radio traffic analysts assigned to CAST. None of the naval officers at CAST were trained in radio traffic analysis so the job fell on me or two other analysts, Charlie Johns or Tom Hoover (both chief radiomen). After writing the dispatches, I passed them to Fabian who had authority to release them for radio transmission.”

Kondo’s Second Fleet supplied battleships, cruisers, and destroyers for the protection of Japan’s Southeast Asia invasion forces in December 1941. Two of his battleships Hiei and Kirishima were assigned to the First Air Fleet for the Hawaii attack.

28. During 1940 and 1941 Albert J. Pelletier, Jr., then a yeoman first class, served on the Navy's cryptographic team at Station US, headed by Agnes Driscoll. In his Cryptolog article (Summer 1992 issue), Pelletier wrote that he worked on the Japanese navy's 5-Num code in 1941; but he erroneously referred to the system as JN-25. Pelletier's work on the SM code can be traced to 1939 in Navy records. See RG 457, SRH 355, Vol. 1, p. 328, MMRB, Archives II. Pelletier retired from naval cryptology as a captain. In military use, according to Whitlock, cryptology refers to enemy codes; cryptography refers to friendly codes such as US Navy codes. Admiral James O. Richardson wrote that Station H obtained information on Japanese warship movements operating in the Central Pacific during May 10, 1940. He did not provide communication data, but indicated the information came from RDF bearings and "plain-language call signs of radio traffic." See James O. Richardson, On The Treadmill to Pearl Harbor (Naval History Division, Department of the Navy, USGPO, 1973), p. 331.
29. Agnes Driscoll is not listed on the US Navy's Cryptology Honor Roll. The roll, prepared by Admiral Chester Nimitz in June 1942, cited 65 men for their cryptographic efforts in using intercepted radio dispatches to penetrate the secret operations orders of the Japanese Fleet from July 1941 to June 1942. In their most famous feat the 65 honorees located the 177-warship Japanese Midway invasion force in May 1942. The northernmost islands in the Hawaiian chain, Midway was the initial target. Relying on information gained from naval intercepts, Admiral Nimitz's 49 warships ambushed the numerically superior Japanese force north of Midway, sank four of Japan's irreplaceable aircraft carriers, and in air battles caused the loss of her most experienced pilots. The three-day battle lasted from June 4 to 6, 1942. The ambush was the turning point of the Pacific War. Japan never regained the offensive. Agnes Meyer Driscoll's collection of 5-Num decrypting activities amassed after June 1939 has not been released. The 5-Num code was Japan's most important naval communications system. It was used to organize the attacks on Pearl Harbor and Midway, and throughout the four years of the Pacific War.

Driscoll's omission from the Cryptology Honor Roll is apparently intended to keep the spotlight off her discovery of the operations code on June 1, 1939. Driscoll was born Agnes May Meyer on July 24, 1889 in Westerville, Ohio, graduated from Ohio State University, Columbus in June 1911 with a Bachelor of Arts degree conferred by the College of Arts, Philosophy and Science; she was severely injured in an auto accident in October 1937 while en route to visit Thomas Jefferson's estate, Monticello in Virginia. Retired, age seventy, from Armed Forces Security Agency, July 31, 1959.

30. For Shakespeare commune, see William F. Friedman and Elizebeth S. Friedman, The Shakespearean Ciphers Examined (Cambridge University Press, 1958) ff. See also James R. Chiles, "Breaking codes was this couple's lifetime career," (Smithsonian, June 1987), p. 128 ff.
31. Captain Duane Whitlock of Station CAST said he first recognized the change in Japan's naval operation code in June 1939 while he was serving as an intercept operator at Station H in Hawaii. "I copied the messages off the Japanese naval airwaves. We called the system the 5-Digit code," said Whitlock during a telephone conversation with the author in May 1999. Using the 5-Digit intercepts that had been obtained and forwarded to Washington, DC in 1939 by Whitlock and other naval intercept operators, Agnes Driscoll began solving the basic elements of the code. Her first breakthrough came in January 1940. According to Laurance Safford, commander of Station US, "Madam X crashed through with one of her strokes of inspiration last January (1940)." See Safford's letter to Joseph Wenger, September 10, 1940, in RG 38, Station US Papers, Box 6, folder 5750-81, MMRB, Archives II.
32. For Layton's quotes concerning Ms. Driscoll, see Edwin Layton, And I Was There (William Morrow & Co. 1985), p. 58.
33. For the 5-Num code similar to Spanish-American war codes, see Greg Mellen, editor, Rhapsody in Purple: A New History of Pearl Harbor. (Cryptologia, July 1982), p. 220. In 1941, the US Navy called the system the 5-Num code, not JN-25, according to Robert Hanyok, Center for Cryptologic History, Fort George G. Meade, Maryland.
34. For FBI confirmation, see FBI report 100-97-1-98.
35. As this book went to press in 1999, RIPs 73 and 80 have been reportedly declassified and are available at Archives II for researchers. Though the author filed FOIA requests with the US Navy and National Archives to see all RIP documents in 1987, RIPs 73 and 80 were never released.
36. For the Hawaiian journey of the elusive Navy transport carrying the latest solutions to the 5-Num code from Washington, DC, see SRH 355, Vol. 1, p. 399, RG 457, MMRB, Archives II. According to Japanese naval records, the 5-Num code in effect from July 1, 1941 to December 4, 1941 was known as Ango Sho D (Navy Code Book D), additive version 7. At midnight December 4, 1941 additive version 8 was placed in effect. For the effective dates that version 7 was in use, see SRN 116741 dated December 2, 1941, in RG 457, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. For additive version 8, see loc. cit.; and discovery of additive version 8 by Station CAST, see the priority dispatch time-clocked at 1502 hours (3:02 P.M.) GMT, which corresponds to 10:02 A.M. in Washington, DC, and 4:30 A.M. on December 4, 1941 in Hawaii. Confirmed by enclosure 2 of US Naval Security Group Command

FOIA release of August 31, 1993, copy in author's file. For Naval Regulations prescribing transport and stowage, see preamble to all RIP publications of the World War II era (in RG 38, Station US Papers, MMRB, Archives II): "This publication is SECRET and shall be handled and accounted for as prescribed in the Navy Regulations and the Registered Publication Manual. It shall be transported by officer messenger only and given Class A stowage." Except for the "slow boat," the policy was inviolate. When the 5-Num recoveries were transported to London and exchanged with the British in January 1941, four US military officers took turns guarding the package, two each from the Army and Navy.

37. Admiral Nagumo originated the three-page comprehensive report of December 16 as his SMS 845 and used the call sign NO SE 44. The report—decoded and translated—can be found in a collection of sixteen Station H intercepts dated between December 9 and 29, 1941, but vital communication data pertaining to the interception details has been omitted from No. 845. Apparently the omission is deliberate, intended to conceal the fact that the 5-Num dispatch was intercepted, decoded, and translated in Hawaii. Rochefort's Communication Summary (COMSUM) of December 16 confirms the interception of NO SE 44. The COMSUM indicates that Nagumo's flagship unloaded several dispatches including that of NOSE 4. At first Rochefort identified the radio call sign as a submarine unit, then later in the paragraph placed a question mark after NOSE 4. See pp. 2, 3, of COMSUM, December 16, 1941 under carriers, in RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
38. For Rochefort's apparent decrypt of message 845, see page 257 of his COMSUM for December 19, 1941, in RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. The Japanese naval dispatch detailing American losses at Pearl Harbor appears to be an abbreviated decryption and translation of Admiral Nagumo's message SMS 845. All communication data have been stripped from the message translation/decryption.

In the COMSUM's English translation on p. 257 the Japanese originator is listed as "Tokyo Navy Department" and addressed to "Three unidentified addresses. (One of which is in the Saigon area)." The abbreviated translation of the text follows the identical syntax form of Nagumo's message SMS 845.

Two other examples of translated Japanese naval "decrypted traffic"—with some communication data—can be found on pages 250 and 251 of the COMSUM. On page 250 a message marked "from decrypted (sic) traffic" details the sailing schedule for the Tairyu Maru in the Marshall Islands for November and December 1941. In the second example on page 251 the COMSUM cites the source as "from encrypted [sic] traffic"; the English translation indicates Commander Carrier Division 5 (carriers Shokaku and Zuikaku were Carrier Division 5) will shortly be in Eastern Marshalls area."

In addition to these three decrypted/translated messages there are two extracts from US Coast Guard intercepts on page 254 dated December 17, 1941, Hawaii Time. See the COMSUMS in December 1941 file folder, PHLO, RG 80, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. 27. At 8:05 A.M. on December 7, Admiral Nagumo transmitted a brief report to Tokyo that was intercepted at Station H by J. J. Perkins, radioman first class. Nagumo quickly reported the results of the attack to Japan. He said two American battleships were destroyed and four badly damaged and a great number of aircraft destroyed. The First Air Fleet lost thirty planes, according to Nagumo's report. Perkins' log notes that Nagumo originated the broadcast as SA FU 1, one of his alternate radio call signs. Three hours later, at 11:09 A.M. Nagumo was addressed in a radio dispatch as YO N 77 (a radio call sign identified four days earlier by CAST), according to Perkins' log entry. See Station H operator log for December 8, 1941, p. 147, Station US papers, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II. Logs are in Tokyo Time. The original Nagumo dispatches of December 7 have not been released by the US Navy.

39. On Thomas Dewey's knowledge of Japanese code interception prior to Pearl Harbor, see Gordon Prange, At Dawn We Slept, (McGraw Hill Book Company. 1981), p. 646.
40. On MacKallor's trip, see RG 457, SRH 355, Vol. I, p. 416; RG 24 for deck log of USS Sepulga, January to March 1941; his account of Purple is in RG 38, Station US papers, release of January 24, 1995, all in Archives II, copies in author's file.
41. On FDR's journey to Annapolis, see White House Usher Books, January 24, 1941, FDRL.
42. On the transfer of codes to Britain see David Kahn, Seizing the Enigma (Houghton Mifflin, 1991).
43. On Ens. Prescott Currier's assignment see SRH 355, Vol. 1, p. 376, in RG 457, MMRB, Archives II.
44. On Weeks aboard Augusta, see Deck Log of Augusta, RG 24, MMRB, Archives II.
45. For Admiral Hart's dispatch, the notation pertaining to Redman, and disclosure that MacKallor brought 5-Num solutions from Station US, see Appendix D of this book.
46. On Rear Admiral Royal Ingersoll, see OPNAV Secret 281500, March 25, 1941, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. Three sets of initials are affixed to Ingersoll's dispatch; those of Redman and Safford are clearly read. However one set of initials that appear to be either AJK, AGK (Alan G. Kirk) or EJK (Ernest J. King) are smudged.
47. See Prescott Currier's letter dated September 7, 1988, in author's file. Currier retired as a Navy captain and lived in Damariscotta, ME. His death was reported in Cryptolog, Winter 1995 issue.

48. A cryptology (decodes of the enemy) blackout was aimed at the two Hawaiian commanders—Admiral Husband E. Kimmel and Lieutenant General Walter Short—in February 1941, soon after they assumed command. The cryptology blackout has been a contentious issue since the spring of 1941. For fifty-eight years either Admiral Kimmel or his surviving family members pressed for access to the Japanese intercepts. Finally on May 25, 1999 the US Senate by a narrow vote found that Kimmel and Short “were denied vital intelligence that was available in Washington.” The Senate vote came nearly 58 years to the day after Admiral Kimmel asked that the US government establish a “cardinal principle” that would assure him of immediate access to information of a secret nature, the Japanese military and diplomatic intercepts. (See article on p. A-26 of New York Times, May 26, 1999: “Scapegoats of Pearl Harbor Are Cleared by a Split Senate.”)

Kimmel was commander-in-chief of the Pacific Fleet, Short the commander of the Hawaiian Department of the US Army. Theoretically both were included members of the “splendid arrangement.” Each had direct access to Army and Navy intercept stations that monitored Japanese diplomatic and military radio broadcasts: Kimmel had Station H (Navy), Short had Station FIVE (Army). Intercepts are worthless unless they can be decoded and translated at a processing center staffed by cryptographers and translators and delivered to the proper commander in a timely manner. Kimmel possessed the only Hawaiian military processing center, Station HYPO; Short had none. The record shows that of the two commanders, only Kimmel sensed he was a victim of the cryptology cutoff. Soon after assuming command of the Pacific Fleet on February 1, 1941, Kimmel sent two personal letters to Admiral Harold Stark, the Chief of Naval Operations, and requested guaranteed access to Japanese intercepts. (1) Paraphrase of Kimmel to Stark, February 18, 1941: “Let there be no misunderstanding, send me information of a secret nature” (PHPT 4, p. 1792). (2) Paraphrase of Kimmel to Stark, May 26, 1941: “Because of lack of information I am in a difficult position.” Kimmel asked Stark to establish a cardinal principle and keep him informed (PHPT 4-1793). Stark replied that he was fully aware of the responsibility of “keeping you adequately informed.” (See PHPT 4, p. 1792.) But Stark did not keep his promise because Station HYPO—the decoding and translation center for the Pacific fleet—was not provided with adequate instructions for decoding Japan’s naval operations code—the 5-Num system—until a few days after the attack. Yet Japan’s most strategic war secrets were intercepted in Hawaii throughout 1941. Japan’s naval war strategy was disclosed in the 5-Num code messages intercepted by the thousands at the US Navy’s Station H on Kaneohe Bay; her diplomatic strategy was revealed in the J Series of codes and the Purple Code which were intercepted by the hundreds at the US Army’s Station FIVE at Fort Shafter.

The three Japanese systems in effect in the fall of 1941, 5-Num, J, and Purple had been solved by US Navy and US Army cryptographers in Washington, DC. There is no record that any of the Army and Navy officers or enlisted men involved in the interception of Japanese dispatches in Hawaii made any attempt to decode these vital messages and deliver the information to either Kimmel or Short. There was no call of alarm by the intercept personnel in Hawaii or by Army and Navy intelligence centers in Washington, DC. No timely attempt was made to deliver the solutions of the Japanese codes to Hawaii—except for the slow boat carrying the secrets of the 5-Num system. Still military information was obtained from the 5-Num dispatches in Hawaii. According to Joseph Rochefort, the commander of HYPO, he and his staff culled military information from the 5-Num messages by a technique he called radio traffic analysis. Rochefort never explained his failure to obtain Washington’s solution of the 5-Num code in an expeditious manner.

49. For the Winds Code controversy, see voluminous citation on testimony given to various Pearl Harbor investigations in 1944–46 in Stanley H. Smith, compiler, Investigations of the Attack on Pearl Harbor. Index to Government Hearings (Greenwood Press, 1990), pp. 41, 42.
50. The British intelligence unit at Singapore, known as the Far East Combined Bureau (FECB), was the source of the Winds Code intercept. See Admiral Thomas Hart’s secret dispatch Serial 281430 of November 28, 1941, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II.
51. For the 1979 declassification of a portion of the pre-Pearl Harbor English translations of the 5-Num intercepts, see President Carter’s Executive Order 12065, Federal Register of June 1, 1979. Carter also released Japanese naval intercepts that include the years 1942–45. There are two versions in Archives II, College Park, MD. One is in RG 457 and contains blackouts that paint out the pre-Pearl Harbor 5-Num code, mistakenly identified in the Carter documents as JN-25. An uncensored version (no words painted out in black) can be found in the Station US papers of RG 38, but with the JN-25 mistake.

On a CNN telecast during December 1991 commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the Pearl Harbor attack, Pentagon correspondent Wolf Blitzer interviewed General Colin Powell, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Blitzer showed Powell some of the Japanese messages from the Carter release. Both apparently were unaware that they were looking at rigged documents.

52. Quotations from David W. Gaddy’s letter of January 28, 1993 to British author James Rusbridger, in author’s file.

1. The description of Ted Emanuel's Boat Day comes from author's interview with Professors Yale Maxon and Denzel Carr, El Cerrito, California, May 9, 1983, in author's file. Emanuel's harbor surveillance had its beginnings in 1936 when Roosevelt authorized the Office of Naval Intelligence to conduct clandestine surveillance of Japanese merchant ships and tankers arriving at Hawaii ports. FDR acted on the advice of a special intelligence task force that included Lieutenant Colonel George S. Patton, Jr., a future Army commander in World War II in Europe. Patton's group detected Japanese "espionage" in Hawaii and warned the White House of spy voyages to Wake and Midway Islands and Honolulu by Japanese marus. On August 10, 1936, Roosevelt accepted the advice and ordered a continual ONI watch of all Japanese vessels calling at Hawaii ports; see RG 80, ONI secret serial A85EF37/EG12, dated June 30, 1936, Archives II. See also Roosevelt's Secret memorandum to CNO dated August 10, 1936, in FDRL.
2. The Navy's wiretap file on Morimura reveals that he took a Foreign Ministry examination for a consular position on March 8, 1941; see Japanese Foreign Office (JFO) Bulletin 463 in FBI file 65-414-7-1, Serial 394. On March 20, JFO Bulletin 464 said he would be ordered to serve in the Foreign Office telegraphic affairs section; see FBI file, 65-414-1A, serial 394. FBI Pearl Harbor files are available at the FBI's Washington, DC headquarters. Navy wiretaps on the consulate's telephone lines were first reported to Hoover by Shivers in a letter dated September 26, 1940. The letter said the Navy presently furnished the FBI with a day-by-day record of the wiretaps. Shivers promised to keep his boss fully informed on information obtained from the wiretaps; see FBI file 65-414-5.
3. For Morimura's "surprise attack" message of December 6, 1941 see facsimile of his message on p. 116 of this book.
4. See J. Edgar Hoover memorandum to Lieut. Gen. George Grunert, president of the Army Pearl Harbor Board, dated August 25, 1944, in RG 80, PHLO, Exhibit 70, pp. 5, 6, Archives II, copy in author's file.
5. For the arrival of the West Virginia at Ten-ten Dock, see RG 24, Deck Log of West Virginia, March 26, 1941, Archives II. This was the only time in 1941 when the battleship berthed at the Navy Yard dock; all her other moorings were at the isolated Battleship Row.
6. For Hoover's warning on Japanese naval officers as spies, see FBI file 65-414-28, para. C, dated Oct. 24, 1940, copy in author's file.
7. Robert Shivers letter dated October 31, 1940; see FBI file 65-414-22, p. 5, copy in author's file.
8. For J. Edgar Hoover letter of December 14, 1940 to Shivers, see p. 6 of Hoover's memorandum dated August 25, 1944, filed with Army Pearl Harbor Board as Exhibit 70; RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
9. Attorney General Janet Reno did not release the complete Nitta Maru file because of its designation as a National Defense Secret. Her press relations official, Carl Stern, a former NBC-TV Supreme Court reporter, backed her up. He wrote that it was unfair for the author to accuse the FBI of stonewalling FOIA requests on Morimura. While at NBC-TV Stern, an attorney, succeeded in obtaining government documents by filing his own FOIAs; see Stern letters of May 25 and Aug. 2, 1994, author's file. Re the Nitta Maru, see FBI FOIA 292,385: six pages of the file are super secret and totally blacked out as this goes to press in 1999. Underscoring the secrecy attached to the six documents by the Department of Justice, neither Reno nor Stern would reveal the dates, serial numbers, or file numbers. The day before Morimura's arrival in Honolulu, Shivers addressed a letter to Hoover dated March 26, 1941. The letter concerned an ONI-FBI investigation, but the text is blacked out in FBI file 66-8603-165.
10. Interview of Frederick G. Tillman by the author, Fowler, California, March 26, 1990. Audio tape, transcript, and notes in author's file.
11. For Matsuoka's March 8, 1941 message to Honolulu re Morimura, see PHPT 37, p. 1101.
12. See the consulate's incoming message log for March 1941, in PHPT 35, pp. 403 ff.; the outgoing message log is on pp. 430 ff. A duplicate of the log is in PHPT 37, starting at page 1101. For Morimura's protocol (diplomatic passport) see FBI report 100-65558, item 1. For Morimura's arrival reported by Honolulu newspapers, Hawaii Hochii, Nippu Jiji, and Star-Bulletin for March 27, 1941. Station US kept a numerical log of the consulate's incoming and outgoing messages but none of the March 1941 Morimura dispatches could be located in the Station US numerical logs; instead there are blank spaces. For the Station US numerical logs concerning radio messages to and from the consulate, see RG 38, Station US papers, folder 5830/30 for March 1941, MMRB, Archives II. The J dispatches also disclosed that a new consul-general, Nagao Kita, was due to arrive in Honolulu March 14, 1941, a week before Morimura. By what is presumed to be pure coincidence, the Star-Bulletin on the same day carried a separate AP story headlined "Modern Spies Lack Oomph, Imagination." As of 1998, the original intercept of H-4 has not been declassified by Archives II. For information on the Mackay Radio dispatches of January 1941 see the

- “bulky enclosure” section of FBI file 65-414. “Bulky” is an FBI term for documents stored with many enclosures, annexes, etc.
13. For Okuda’s Armistice Day statements, see Honolulu Star-Bulletin, November 11, 1940, byline by Lawrence Nakatsuka; also FBI file 65-414-30.
 14. For Frederick G. Tillman’s identification of Otojiro Okuda as involved in intelligence matters, see State Department decimal file 702.9411a/37, RG 59, Diplomatic Branch, Archives II. Hoover sent Tillman’s comprehensive report on Japanese espionage activities in Hawaii to Adolf Berle on Oct. 6, 1941. Tillman prepared the report on August 22, 1941.
 15. Nitta Maru was a 17,000-ton luxury passenger liner built for the Tokyo-Europe run. The ship’s maiden voyage in June 1940 was diverted to San Francisco due to the European war. Admiral Yamamoto then conscripted the vessel for military transport. In November and December 1941 it transported aviators of the Eleventh Air Fleet to Takeo, Formosa for support of the amphibious landings in Southeast Asia. Then in January 1942 the ship transported reinforcements for the Japanese garrison that captured Wake Island. Nitta Maru was assigned to Carrier Division Three in March 1942 and converted to an aircraft carrier. As such she was commissioned in November 1942 and renamed HIMJS Chuyo; she was sunk by USS Sailfish on December 4, 1943, southeast of Tokyo Bay.
 16. Lt. Denzel Carr, a prewar University of Hawaii professor and naval reservist, had taught previously in Japan at Otani and Wakayama Universities in Kyoto. After the war, he became a tenured professor and later chairman of the department of Oriental Languages, University of California, Berkeley. He was a Guggenheim Fellow in 1955. Carr “Known to Anderson”; see CNO confidential letter, Serial 0361316, Dec. 6, 1940 signed by W. S. Anderson, Director of Naval Intelligence. The letter included a November 1940 report by Captain W. S. Kilpatrick, the US Navy’s Inspector-General, that praised Carr: “The work of Lieutenant Carr has special qualifications unequalled by anyone else in the United States naval service of intelligence.” Praise was heaped equally on Emanuel’s work as “outstanding.” See Anderson’s letter and Kilpatrick’s report in RG 181, National Archives, San Bruno, CA. Carr was born in Kentucky in 1902 and died in Berkeley, CA. on Oct. 14, 1984. The mission of Carr’s unit, the District Intelligence Office of the Fourteenth Naval District, was totally different from that of Station HYPO, Rochefort’s organization located in the Pearl Harbor Naval Yard six miles distant. Station HYPO was concerned with combat intelligence derived from intercepted Japanese naval messages, while Carr and his associates dealt with domestic intelligence and espionage matters.
 17. Okuda to escort Morimura, see Globe Wireless intercept of March 24, 1941, PHPT 35, p. 454, item 68. Duplicate in PHPT 37, p. 1094.
 18. Queen Liliuokalani was a celebrated and accomplished composer. The Hawaiian monarchs supported the Royal Hawaiian Band as a public cultural legacy. After the Queen was overthrown in an 1893 cabal led by American economic interests, public subscriptions continued funding the band. The Royal Hawaiian Band is not connected with the Royal Hawaiian Hotel.
 19. Denzel Carr interview with the author, El Cerrito, CA, May 9, 1983; in author’s files.
 20. For Theodore Emanuel’s identification of Morimura, see COM 14 District Intelligence Confidential File A-8-5, dated March 28, 1941 included in FBI file 65-414 serial 67 1/2. Emanuel’s report was signed by Captain Irving Mayfield, District Intelligence Officer for Hawaii. Ted Emanuel’s photograph of Morimura has not been located in USN files at Archives II nor was it included in the FBI report serial 67 1/2 cited above. The FBI file copy has blacked out Mayfield’s signature but left Theodore Emanuel’s initials “TE” in the upper right corner. Photography of Japanese diplomats was a sore subject with the consulate. In April 1937, shortly after FDR issued the surveillance order, a “disguised” naval photographer, A. J. Carroll, created an international incident when he carried out the Roosevelt policy: Carroll in civilian clothes began photographing Japanese Consul-General Toyokichi Fukuma during a bon voyage send-off for the naval tanker HIMJS Hayatomo. Hearing the click of the camera’s shutter, Fukuma’s staff pummeled Carroll, then had him arrested and taken to the Honolulu police station. Though no formal charges were brought against Carroll, his cover was blown. Admiral O. G. Murphree, then commandant of the Fourteenth Naval District, protested the Japanese action to the Secretary of the Navy. See RG 187, National Archives, San Bruno, CA., COM 14 DIO, confidential file A-8-2 (2) of April 8–9, 1937. See also the newspaper Hawaii Hochii of April 9, 1937 for story and pictures of the incident. Carroll’s surveillance duties were assumed by Chief Yeoman Theodore Emanuel.
 21. Frederick G. Tillman interview with the author tape-recorded March 26, 1990, Fowler, CA. In author’s file.
 22. Ibid.
 23. Washington, DC intelligence officials who admitted seeing the spy reports included Captain Theodore Wilkinson, Director of Naval Intelligence, and Brigadier General Sherman Miles, US Army intelligence; see their testimony in chapter 7 herein. For J. Edgar Hoover’s reaction see Note 40, this chapter. Frederick Tillman not given intercepts: see his interview with author, Fowler, CA, March 26, 1990, in author’s file.

24. From 1942 to 1944 America's top law enforcement officials investigated Richard Kotoshirodo. The investigation was spurred by J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI, and involves Assistant Attorneys General Wendell Burge and Tom Clark; the latter became a justice of the US Supreme Court. The FBI main file number on Kotoshirodo is 65-41886; the file is available at the J. Edgar Hoover Building in Washington, DC. Copies of the file were obtained by the author through a FOIA request though much of the file is blacked out. In the interviews, Kotoshirodo details his spy excursions to Pearl Harbor, areas on Oahu, and neighboring islands of Kauai, Maui, and the Big Island (Hawaii). FBI report 65-41886-18 includes a 55-page report on Kotoshirodo's spy activities and concludes with a finding by investigators that Kotoshirodo willingly assisted Morimura, Okuda, and Seki. A Territorial Internee Hearing Board found that Kotoshirodo assisted Morimura and others to willingly commit the crime of espionage by observing and reporting US military installations. In connection with the Territorial Hearing Board action, Kotoshirodo gave this statement to Frederick G. Tillman of the FBI, on August 24, 1943: "I understood that I was gathering naval information for the Japanese Government when I made these trips, but I gave no thought as to what my superiors in the consulate were going to do with it" (FBI file 65-41886-32-5). In FBI report 65-41886-9-32-5, J. Edgar Hoover proposes prosecution of Kotoshirodo to Assistant Attorney General Wendell Burge. Attorney General Tom Clark's involvement is shown in FBI report 65-41886-41, p. 9. Prosecution of Kotoshirodo was denied by the US Attorney in Hawaii, G. Douglas Crozier, on March 18, 1944, in FBI report 65-41886-52.

Kotoshirodo's activities were not directly linked to Morimura until after the attack; see FBI report 65-41886-14. The 1941 US Navy wiretap transcript mentions Kotoshirodo's name but there is no hint of his spy activity. Seki emerges in the 1941 transcript as purchasing cameras, binoculars, maps, and film for the consulate. Frederick Tillman's initials on each wiretap indicate the date he read the transcript in 1941. Kotoshirodo and his wife, Joan, were interned at Topaz, Utah.

25. Station US ordered that diplomatic messages between Tokyo and overseas missions containing a five-numeral group at or near the beginning of messages and none at the end, and with a five-letter group of the form consonant-vowel-consonant-vowel-consonant, be forwarded immediately by teleprinter to Washington, DC. See OP-20-G, Secret serial 044320, Mar. 5, 1941 in COM 13, A6-2 files, RG 181, National Archives, Seattle, WA, copy in author's file.
26. Station TWO airtailed the intercepts to Washington for processing. The exact time and day that Station TWO discarded the slower airmail delivery and began forwarding intercepts by the faster teleprinter is in dispute. Army testimony claims that teleprinter transmission began Dec. 6, 1941. Col. Robert Schukraft, head of Army intercept stations, testified to the Joint Congressional Investigation that he used the teleprinter in a conference with Station TWO on Nov. 28, 1941; see PHPT 10, p. 4914. Records of Station US indicate that "AT" (Army teleprinter) was in use at Station TWO, May 12, 1941; see RG 38, Station US papers, Folder 5830/30, MMRB, Archives II. Fort Hunt, Virginia, known as Station SEVEN, intercepted one of Okuda's January messages. Fort Hunt is sixteen miles south of Washington on the Potomac River.
27. For the one-day decode of J series, see PHPT 36, p. 67.
28. See Oahu telephone directory, Spring and Fall 1941, Library of Congress, copy in author's file. The consulate buildings were demolished by Japan after the war and a new consulate built. But the stone gate used by Morimura still exists and faces outward on Kuakini Street near the corner of Nuuanu Avenue.
29. For "overzealous" critique, see Denzel Carr's interview with the author, May 9, 1983, El Cerrito, CA, in author's file. On Emanuel's home and activities in 1941, see interview with Denzel Carr and Yale Maxon, El Cerrito, CA, in author's file. Emanuel lived in Honolulu on Pacific Heights Road, according to FBI file 6233413-1024, copy in author's file.
30. The Shunchoro restaurant was still in operation in 1994, in the same building and location, 2101 Aulii Street, Honolulu. Poinciana trees and neighborhood growth now obscure the Ewa views toward Pearl Harbor. The genial proprietor took the author on a tour of the two floors and said the premises were exactly the same as in 1941, except for a new kitchen. One policy change in service—no drop-in trade. Private parties only with reservations.
31. For description of the hired Packard limousine, and its "trips to the country," see FBI file 65-41886. The file is a post-attack investigation by the FBI and runs from item 1 to 75. All items of the file must be consulted as there are many cross-references to the espionage conducted from the Japanese consulate in 1941.
32. Teisaku Eto was the innocent sixty-seven-year-old proprietor of the soft-drink stand near the Pan American China Clipper base and the naval enlisted men's landing. For the location of the enlisted men's landing, see berthing chart of Pearl Harbor in PHPT 33, p. 1397, item 5. For description of Morimura and Kotoshirodo's visits to Eto's stand, see ONI Investigation Report, dated June 15, 1942, COM 14 file in RG 181, folder 58-3402, Box VOO9468, National Archives, San Bruno, CA. For quote that Morimura was amused by USN laxity, see ibid., p. 10, item 32. Eto was loyal to America and was not engaged in espionage. At that time American exclusion laws would not allow Eto or any other Japanese emigrant to obtain American citizenship.

The PAA terminal site could be seen in 1991. Foundations and cement lanais marked the historic Trans-Pacific Hawaii terminal at Franklin and Laniwai Avenues in Pearl City.

“Scuttlebutt” was navy slang for gossip.

Hawaiians rarely use traditional compass directions. Instead they say makai, toward the sea; mauka, toward the mountains; ewa (pronounced eh-vah), northwest of Pearl Harbor; Diamond Head, southwest of Pearl Harbor.

33. On Morimura’s bank credit problem, see FBI file 65-414-2-2, serial 258. For Denzel Carr’s “outside” note, see FBI file 65-414-3-1, serial 349.
34. Morimura’s two phases of espionage reports can be documented through the Japanese consulate’s outgoing message log, found in PHPT 35 starting on p. 430. A clear picture of Tadashi Morimura’s activities can be traced by combining the incoming and outgoing message files, together with the English translations of the intercepts. To this information must be added the telephone calls—revealed by the wiretaps—to the Honolulu cable firms for a motorcycle messenger, and taxi and limousine charges for “trips to the country.” By assembling and arranging this information into a daily basis, it is possible to reconstruct a day in the espionage life of Morimura on Oahu. For example, his arrival in Honolulu on March 27, 1941 can be documented through three sources: (1) the consulate’s outgoing message file, in PHPT 35, p. 431, (2) the Mackay Radio message announcing his arrival, in PHPT 35, p. 441 and PHPT 37, p. 1026; (3) intercept by the US Army’s Station TWO can be confirmed in the Station US diplomatic-intercept log found in RG 38, Station US papers, folder 5830/30, MMRB, Archives II.

Morimura left a paper trail when he filed his first bomb plot of Pearl Harbor on August 21, 1941. His “diary” can be reconstructed from three sources: (1) the outgoing message log in PHPT 35, pp. 437 and 439 and PHPT 12, p. 262, (2) a two-dollar charge for the Packard taxi in FBI file 65-41886-20, (3) proof that the bomb-plot message was intercepted at Station SEVEN and CAST can be found in RG 38, Station US papers, folder 5830/30, MMRB, Archives II. His drunken binge is confirmed by the wiretaps in FBI file 65-414, “bulky” section, “bulky” being an oversize archival filing method designed by the FBI. See Morimura’s daily record of 1941 compiled by the author, in author’s files. Mackay’s Washington office as Station X is confirmed by Station US message log in RG 38, Station US papers, folder 5830/30 for January 11, 1941, Archives II.
35. Officials knew of Morimura: Hoover to Berle containing Tillman’s “outside man” quote; Hoover to Maj. Gen. Edwin “Pa” Watson in FBI file 61-10556, serials 395, 399, 402, 405. Contents of Hoover’s messages are classified as National Defense Secrets by the FBI in 1999, copies with FBI blackouts, in author’s file.
36. Joint Investigative Committee reports were signed by these officials: Colonel James Lester of the War Department, Captain “CENSORED” of the Navy, and Edward Tamm, Assistant Director of the FBI and Hoover’s third in command. See Report of the Committee of Intelligence Trends (an adjunct of the J.I.C. in FBI HDQ file 66-8603-165, p. 9. For Berle see p. 16. The FBI report blacked out the name of the USN captain for unknown reasons. Meetings of the J.I.C. alternated between the Munitions Building (US Army headquarters), Navy Department, and FBI headquarters. Roosevelt couldn’t keep Directors of Naval Intelligence for long during 1941. Walter Anderson departed for Pearl Harbor in January. Then Captain Jules James briefly served until March. Next, Captain Alan Kirk stepped into the director’s office. He departed rapidly when his friend, Admiral Adolphus Andrews, warned, “Get out of Naval Intelligence as fast as you can.” See Kirk, The Reminiscences of Alan Goodrich Kirk (New York: Oral History Research Office, Columbia University, 1962), p. 182. Apparently Andrews, a former US Fleet commander, was aware of McCollum’s eight-action policy. Kirk was gone by October 1941, relieved by Captain Theodore Wilkinson, one of Anderson’s battleship commanders, who moved from command of the USS Mississippi to the ONI post.
37. For quote “out of all reasonable proportion,” see item 3 in FBI memorandum dated April 29, 1941 in FBI file 8603, serial 180x, copy in author’s file.
38. Ibid.
39. For mail cover order, see RG 59, State Department Decimal File, 702.9411A/35, Diplomatic Branch, Archives II, copy in author’s file.
40. See Complete Presidential Press Conferences of Franklin D. Roosevelt (New York: DaCapo Press. 1972), Vol. 17, pp. 401, 402.
41. For Hoover’s be most “circumspect” order, see FBI file 66-8603, item 326, dated April 15, 1941, copy in author’s file.
42. “No expulsion possible,” see Berle diary, p. 196, June 3, 1941, FDRL, copy in author’s file.
43. For reports sent to Berle by Hoover naming Morimura and Kita, see date August 7, 1941 in State Department Decimal File 702.9411A/35, item 35 in RG 59, Diplomatic Branch, Archives II, copy in author’s file. For Morimura first being placed on the “most dangerous list,” see Ted Emanuel’s report in Note 20 of this chapter.
44. J. Edgar Hoover continued to pursue Morimura into the postwar years. In 1961, when Walter Cronkite and CBS-TV brought Morimura to Hawaii for the twentieth anniversary of the attack, Hoover saw another opportunity to arrest the spy for espionage. FBI agents tailed Cronkite and his TV crew when they photographed Morimura at Pearl Harbor.

Hoover asked President John Kennedy's assistant attorney-general, J. Walter Yeagley, for permission to charge Morimura and was turned down. See FBI File 94-4-925 and 100-65558, copies in author's file.

1. For bomb plots produced during Phase II, see the English version of Morimura's Japanese-language map recovered from a downed Japanese aircraft on December 7, 1941 in this chapter on p. 106. The original Japanese version found in the aircraft was not located by the author in Archives II.
2. See transcripts of the Japanese consulate's purchase of maps, postcards, cameras, and binoculars in FBI wiretap file 65-414, Subsections 2 through 4 serials 123 to 940. The author counted a total of 817 Honolulu consulate wiretap reports for 1941. Be aware that the wiretap was the work of naval intelligence in Hawaii which provided the file to the FBI.
3. Description of the August 21, 1941 spy trip is based on interrogation of Kotoshirodo by US Navy intelligence officers, see RG 181, COM 14 Confidential A-8-5 file, NA, San Bruno, CA, dated February 18, 1941 to April 30, 1942. See also the FBI interrogation of Kotoshirodo in chapter 6 of this book.

On June 21, 1941 Japan's Foreign Minister ordered a new version of the J code placed in effect, which US Navy cryptologists called J-19. Though Morimura's bomb plot message of August 21, 1941 has never been released publicly by the United States, its radiotelegraphy route from Honolulu to San Francisco to Washington to Tokyo can be traced in Japanese and American records. The bomb-plot-message day (August 21) involving both Richard Kotoshirodo and Tadashi Morimura can be reconstructed from FBI and US Navy records and from the Japanese consulate's outgoing message log: first the Packard taxi was ordered by telephone from John Mikami's Royal Taxi Stand. Mikami arrived at the consulate, picked up Kotoshirodo, and drove him to the heights overlooking Pearl Harbor. It was a two-hour spy trip and Mikami charged two dollars (FBI file 65-41886-20). Kotoshirodo briefed Morimura on the location of the US warships. The bomb-plot details were then encoded in the J-19 code system. Three copies were dispatched by RCA: (1) to the San Francisco Japanese consulate, (2) to Ambassador Kichisaburo Nomura in Washington, DC, and (3) to Foreign Minister Admiral Teijiro Toyoda in Tokyo, who replaced Matsuoka in the July 1941 shakeup of the Imperial Cabinet. Once the spy messages hit the RCA airwaves, they were intercepted at both Station SEVEN at Fort Hunt, Virginia, and Station CAST on Corregidor.

The outgoing Honolulu message log of the Japanese consulates is in PHPT 35, pp. 437, 439ff., and PHPT 37, pp. 1096ff.

For confirmation of US interception, see RG 38, Station US papers, folder 5830/30, MMRB, Archives II. See also FBI file 65-414, "bulky," which contains excerpts from the consulate's account book showing RCA charges. "Bulky" is a file term used by the FBI to indicate oversize, extra copies, enclosures, etc., attached to regular reports. FBI reports are filed by categories represented by a main file number. Example: 65-414-1 signifies that 65 is the category; 414 is the case number and the first report (or serial number) is 1. Subsections can be added. Voluminous records such as a 500-page supplementary report may be placed in a "bulky" file within 65-414.

4. Wiretapped conversations of August 21-23, 1941 are in FBI File 65-414, copies in author's file. For Okuda being worried about police matter on August 22, 1941, see subsection 4, serial 647, pp. 3ff. For the Nakatsuka interview with unnamed consulate employee August 23, 1941, see loc. cit. serial 654, pp. 1ff. Each wiretap transcription contains an FBI route stamp with initial T for Frederick G. Tillman, the FBI case agent assigned to investigate the consulate.
5. See Hoover-Berle correspondence, Aug. 7, 1941 in RG 59, State Department Decimal File 702,9411A/35, Diplomatic Branch, Archives II, copy in author's file. See FBI file 61-10556, serials 354, 355, 357, 361, 368 for the special messenger reports sent to Adolf Berle by Hoover. See FBI file 61-10556, serials 395, 399, 402, 405, which date from October 29 to November 13, 1941, copy author's file. Hoover forwarded the reports to FDR via the President's military aide, Major General Edwin "Pa" Watson. Eight "special messenger" reports, some containing British intercepts of Japanese messages, were delivered. One serial, 61-10556-399, dated November 13, 1941, contains 32 pages of British WT (wireless/telegraph, a British synonym for intercepts) intercepts of Japanese messages. Hoover wrote a directive by hand on serial 399 to his assistant, Clyde Tolson: "Get this to Watson, Berle, Miles and Wilkinson at once." Attorney General Janet Reno and her public affairs chief, Carl Stern, declined to declassify Serial 399 and labeled it a B-1 National Defense Secret under the provisions of the FOIA act.
6. For espionage underway, see Wilkinson's testimony in PHPT 4-1841.
7. See Adolf Berle's diary entry dated June 3, 1941, FDRL, copy author's file.
8. For Mackay messenger request by Honolulu consulate, see transcript of Navy wiretap in FBI file 65-414-Subsection A-4-serials 759, 780. For intercepts of the second bomb-plot message, see Station US intercept logs in RG 38,

- Station US papers, folder 5830/30, MMRB, Archives II, copy author's file.
9. See the Miles-Gesell exchange in PHPT 2, pp. 787, 794, 795, 797.
 10. For Wilkinson exchange with Gesell, "I don't recall," see hearing testimony December 18, 1945 in PHPT 4, pp. 1748 ff. Two months after Wilkinson was questioned by Congress, he drowned when his car plunged off a ferryboat near Norfolk, Virginia.
 11. For this lunch at the White House, see the Usher Book for October 14, 1941, FDRL, copies in author's file. For this FDR-Sarnoff exchange, see PHPT 20, p. 4468 ff; Sarnoff's cablegram sent from Honolulu and addressed to the President is on a White House cablegram form dated November 13, 1941. In a note at upper right of the cablegram FDR wrote by hand: "Steve to thank him." (Steve Early was FDR's press secretary.) For request for Forrestal-Kimmel to extend courtesies to Sarnoff, see RG 80, PHLO; CINCPAC flag file, Incoming Dispatches Serial 281812, October 26, 1941, MMRB, Archives II; in this document Assistant Secretary of the Navy James Forrestal asked Admiral Husband Kimmel and Rear Admiral Claude Bloch, commandant of Hawaii's Fourteenth Naval District, to extend every courtesy to David Sarnoff. In addition to RCA, Sarnoff was president of NBC, the National Broadcasting Company. Its radio news operation included KGU, the NBC affiliate in Honolulu. He was a skilled Morse Code operator and a real live newsman. In his youth he worked for Marconi Radio & Telegraph stations on the East Coast. On April 14, 1912, he picked up the SS Titanic's SOS, and for the next seventy-two hours provided nonstop reports of the sinking and the rescue efforts to news organizations.
 12. See Joseph Rochefort's discussion of Sarnoff's visit to Honolulu and the ability of Station HYPO to decode the messages: "We could read most of that stuff as it came in. The simple ones we could read." PHPT 23, p. 686, given on January 2, 1942 during testimony before the Roberts Commission in Honolulu.
 13. For the radio order to Captain Mayfield, see RG 80, PHLO, CINCPAC outgoing radio message files, microfiche form, MMRB, Archives II. When seen by the author this microfiche was in a state of serious deterioration, so the author photocopied the document so that there would be a readable record for future research; author's file. Lieut. Yale Maxon was an American interpreter for the Tokyo War Crimes trial after the war and translated interviews with Japan's wartime Premier, Hideki Tojo. Later Maxon became a professor at the Merritt Campus of Peralta Colleges, Oakland, California.
 14. The original alert sent to Rochefort by Maxon is in the Rochefort Papers, held by his daughter, Janet Rochefort Elerding, of Santa Ana, CA. In 1982 she permitted the author to make a photocopy which was shown to and identified by Maxon and Carr during interviews at their homes in 1983, copy author's file. Neither Maxon nor Carr testified before any of the Pearl Harbor investigations.
 15. For Morimura's spy message transmitted to the Akagi on December 2, 1941, see Mitsuo Fuchida, The Japanese Navy in World War II (US Naval Institute Press, 1969), p. 20. Beware of the scrambling of the message numbers by Woodward, for it can confuse any Pearl Harbor investigator. The Japanese consulate's outgoing log book numbered the message as 357 and it was transmitted by RCA as their radio message 363; see PHPT 35, p. 433 ff. For Woodward decoding before December 7, 1941, see his handwritten note in Exhibits and Illustrations of the Hewitt Inquiry, PHPT 38 item 153 ff. For his placing the question mark on RCA radio message 363, see ibid. item 151. The author believes numbers 357 and 363 are one and the same and represent the identical Morimura message that Fuchida received aboard the Akagi on December 2, 1941 (Tokyo Time). The original 5-Num transmission to the Akagi has not been released by the US government.
 16. For cable companies refusing to turn over Japanese messages, see Shivers' report 65-414 dated December 26, 1941, in Record Group 59, US State Department decimal file 702.9411A/75, Diplomatic Branch, Archives II, copy author's file. Note that the cited Shivers report was not found in the FBI file 65-414 released by FOIA request to the author. For local radio firms refusing to hand over Japanese messages; see PHPT 36, p. 477. According to testimony given to Pearl Harbor investigators by Army, Navy, and FBI intelligence officers, the Hawaii RCA manager, George Street, declined to turn over the messages, claiming that the FCC Act of 1934 protected private communications. Robert Shivers said, "They flatly refused to turn over the wireless messages." Whether he knew it or not, Shivers' testimony muddled the truth because Army and Navy intelligence bypassed Street, ignored the FCC Act, and intercepted the espionage messages off the Tokyo-Hawaii radio circuits of RCA and Mackay. Each message was decoded and translated in Washington, but not forwarded to Hawaii.
 17. For the testimony of Wilkinson, Layton, and Rochefort concerning cable company refusals, see PHPT 36 p. 477. As this book goes to press, there have been nine official Pearl Harbor investigations conducted in the United States: (1) Roberts Commission proceedings, 1942; (2) Admiral Thomas Hart's inquiry of 1944; (3) Army Proceedings, 1944; (4) Navy Court of Inquiry, 1944; (5) Clarke Investigation, 1944; (6) The Clausen Investigation 1944-45; (7) Admiral Henry Kent Hewitt investigation of 1945; (8) The Joint Congressional Investigation of 1945-46, and (9) Senator Strom Thurmond's investigation of 1995.
 18. See the consulate's message log book in the Clausen investigation report, PHPT 35 starting on page 430. See the - Station US log book in RG 38, Station US papers, Folder 5830/30, entitled Jap Dip. Trf. Logs (outgoing), 1941, MMRB, Archives II, and author's file. The USN log lists the place of the interception of the spy messages.

19. For Wilkinson's "fairly secure" quote, see PHPT 4, p. 1849.
 20. Telephone conversation between author and Robert Dowd from Oakdale, California, May 13, 1999; transcript and notes in author's file. Japanese communications intelligence intercepted in the Pacific was encoded in COPEK or a sister system, CETYH, and dispatched over the US Navy's radio network. Encryption and decoding were done on an electric cipher machine (ECM), that was similar in concept to Japan's Purple machine and Germany's Enigma machine. Six Navy commands held the "keys": CAST, HYPO, and Station US plus Admirals Hart, Kimmel, and King. The code systems, believed by the United States to be totally secure and unsolvable by enemies, were placed in operation on November 4, 1941 and carried the bulk of intercepted Japanese communications intelligence through December 7. For USN placing the COPEK system in effect, see OPNAV SECRET serial 042036 of November 4, 1941, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. Another similar Navy system, TESTM, transmitted radio direction finder data during November and December 1941. The two systems were used to transmit communications intelligence concerning Japanese military moves to the White House.
 21. For Noyes quote, "could send to Honolulu," see PHPT 10, p. 4714.
 22. Stations CAST and US held the solutions or "keys" to J-19 before the attack. Hawaii's ability to decode J-19 is murky. Thomas Dyer, Station HYPO's chief cryptographer wrote: "We did have [the ability to decode] J-19, but had no traffic to work." (Dyer letter to author, June 4, 1983, in author file.) Farnsley Woodward, HYPO's diplomatic cryptographer, testified to the Hewitt inquiry: "I did not work on J-19" (PHPT 36, p. 320). Morimura's J-19 dispatch to the Akagi on December 2, 1941 was in J-19, according to the consulate's log book, and was delivered to Woodward at Station HYPO on Friday, December 5, 1941, according to his written note. But four senior US naval officers gave varied answers when the J-19 decoding question was posed to them during the Joint Congressional Investigation of 1945-46. Leigh Noyes, the 1941 Director of Naval Communications was adamant: "We could not decrypt J-19 at Pearl Harbor" (PHPT 10-4714), Joseph Rochefort, commander of Station HYPO, testified that his cryptographers "could not decode J-19 without special equipment" (PHPT 10-4674). His testimony conflicted with what he gave to the Roberts Commission on January 2, 1942, see Note 12 in this chapter. Earl E. Stone, Chief of Naval Communications in 1945 was less sure: "No evidence has been found that J-19 could be processed in Hawaii." (See his letter to the Pearl Harbor congressional staff, dated February 28, 1946, serial 0003042P20 in RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II.) Joseph Wenger, an assistant to Stone, was more cautious when he wrote: "J-19 was not available at Pearl in registered publications," (Wenger to Pearl Harbor congressional staff, November 9, 1945 serial 00023P20. His letter was found in a special Pearl Harbor document release authorized by an FOIA and delivered to the author by the Naval Security Group Command, August 31, 1993, in author file). While the four naval officials provided nebulous information concerning the decoding of the J-19 system before December 7, 1941, their commander-in-chief, President Roosevelt, received decrypts in the system, according to Laurance Safford, head of Station US: "The naval aide (Captain John Beardall) saw Jig-19 and took the messages to the President." (See Safford testimony before the Hewitt Investigation, PHPT 36, p. 64.) The solutions to the Japanese code systems, both military and diplomatic, were distributed to the Pacific intercept stations and processing centers as Registered Intelligence Publications (RIP). Strict procedures were in place to assure the security of the code solutions. In 1941 each US naval base, ship, and station had a Registered Publications Office that accounted for the RIPs and other secret documents. The records of each RPO which show the status of the RIPs in 1941 at each monitoring station have not been declassified. Station CAST was regularly intercepting, translating, and reading J-19 during the fall of 1941, according to an affidavit filed with the Joint Congressional Investigation of 1945-46 by John Lietwiler, CAST's co-commander. Lietwiler said Station US regularly furnished his cryptographers with daily updates on the J-19 solution procedures. See his affidavit in RG 38, Station US Papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. See the daily solutions to J-19 provided by Laurance Safford, commander of Station US, in RG 38, loc. cit., and in author's file. The testimony is overwhelming. At least five naval officers (Dyer, Woodward, Rochefort, Safford, and Lietwiler) and President Roosevelt were aware of the J-19 messages before the attack.
 23. See Morimura's "opportunity for surprise attack" message and related items reproduced on p. 116 in this chapter. Members of the 1945-46 Congressional investigation heard about the Navy's failure to timely decode Morimura's message during the following exchange between investigator Gerhard Gesell (later appointed a federal district judge in Washington, DC) and Theodore Wilkinson, the Navy's pre-Pearl Harbor intelligence chief:

GESELL: "It was tragic that that was not decoded before."
WILKINSON: "Yes sir."
GESELL: "How do you account for the fact that that was not decoded, when the decoders were decoding very rapidly and decoding messages in great number that day, the sixth?"
WILKINSON: "I do not account for it sir" (PHPT 4, p. 1854).

Since Morimura's message to the oncoming Japanese bombers and torpedo planes was in the simple PA code, the timely decoding procedures in Washington's Station US are of immense interest. Laurance Safford, commander of Station US, testified to the Hewitt investigation: "We had no difficulty in reading PA." (PHPT 36, p. 67)

24. See Morimura's "no barrage balloons and surprise attack" message on p. 116 of this chapter.
25. For consulate messages received, decoded, and translated before December 7, 1941, see PHPT 38, starting with item 149, which is the December 1941 RCA statement of toll charges for the Japanese consulate. See Farnsley Woodward's handwritten note "received 5 Dec. 41" on items 179, 178, 177, 176, 175. On Item 156 Woodward wrote: "Received on 5 Dec. 1941. Deciphered and translated prior to 7 Dec. 1941. Original message sent to Washington, translation retained by Pearl" /ss/ Woodward. For other messages received on December 5, 1941 by Woodward, see items 153, 154, 155 ff. Woodward identified a J-19 message sent over RCA on December 2. His handwritten note on the message reads: "J-19 K-10 transportation." Woodward circled the five-letter group HAHVK as the Japanese indicator for the J-19 system. (Item 249)
26. For Rochefort's quote, "cheap price," see The Reminiscences of Captain Joseph J. Rochefort (US Naval Institute Oral History Program, 1970), p. 163, copy in author's file.
27. See Joseph Finnegan's testimony before Pearl Harbor proceedings of Admiral Henry Kent Hewitt, June 8, 1945, PHPT 36. p. 251ff. Finnegan was then a Navy captain working at FRUPAC—the post-Pearl Harbor acronym given to Station HYPO which stood for Fleet Radio Unit Pacific. On December 7, 1941 Lieut. Finnegan was Flag Lieutenant for Rear Admiral Daniel Bagley, Commander of Battleship Division Two of the Pacific Fleet. In his testimony given to the Hewitt proceedings Finnegan said that Admiral Kimmel directed his temporary transfer to HYPO for translation duties. He received permanent orders on February 15, 1942. Finnegan was also a subordinate of Rear Admiral Walter Anderson, Commander Battleships.

1. On Japanese males being drafted, see an estimate by British in PHPT 31, p. 3218, item FE-290. See also estimate of Colonel Harry Cresswell, US Army military attaché in Tokyo, PHPT 34, p. 186, serial 505.
2. For more on the China Incident, which is a Tokyo euphemism for Japan's aggression against China, see John Toland, The Rising Sun (Random House, 1970), pp. 37 ff.
3. For the total embargo against Japan advocated by McCollum's Action H, see where FDR signed Executive Order 8832 on July 26, 1941 (he announced the embargo on July 25) in Jonathan Marshall, To Have And Have Not (University of California Press, 1995), p.127; see also The Magic Background of Pearl Harbor (Department of Defense, GPO), Vol. II, p. A-226, item 447.
4. For Rochefort quote, see Rochefort's Oral History (in booklet form), The Reminiscences of Captain Joseph J. Rochefort (Annapolis: US Naval Institute Oral History Program, 1970), p. 65. His Oral History contains 307 pages transcribed from four interviews conducted by Commander Etta Belle Kitchen at Rochefort's home in Redondo Beach, California, August 14, September 21, October 5, and December 6, 1969.
5. For 100 aircraft carriers, see Stefan Terzibaschitsch. Aircraft Carriers of the US Navy, 2nd ed. (Naval Institute Press, 1989), p. 304.
6. For Japan's peacetime oil requirements, see Hiroyuki Agawa, The Reluctant Admiral (Naval Institute Press 1979), p. 235; and Yale C. Maxon, Control of Japanese Foreign Policy (University of California Press. 1957), p. 168. To convert metric tons of crude oil to barrels multiply the number of metric tons by 7.3 barrels per ton, according to the American Petroleum Institute, Washington, DC. In an effort to conserve oil supplies Japan converted public transportation vehicles such as buses to coal-burning engines, according to George Matsumoto of Oakland, CA, who visited relatives on Kyushu during the summer of 1941; interview by the author in January 1999.
7. America's 1943 timetable was accurate. United States carrier task forces began the sustained assault on Japan in November 1943 with the invasion of Tarawa, when the first of the Essex and Independence class carriers, with their protective battleship, cruiser, and destroyer escorts reported to the Pacific Fleet.
8. For US carrier keels laid, see Francis E. McMurtrie, ed., Janes Fighting Ships 1942 (Macmillan, 1943), pp. 450, 451.
9. For the start of Japan's China recall, see Rochefort's Daily Communication Summary, September 4, 1941, RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II.
10. The order of battle of Japanese Fleet was prepared by Duane Whitlock, a traffic analyst at Station CAST in 1941. Taped audio interview at Danville, California in September 1993, and in telephone interviews in May 1999, author's file.
11. During the pre-Pearl Harbor era, the Pacific Fleet was in the early stages of forming a Fast Carrier Force. In 1940, Vice Admiral Charles A. Blakely, a pioneer Navy aviator, organized the carriers USS Enterprise, Saratoga, Yorktown, and Lexington into a command known as the Aircraft Scouting Force. Blakely faced stiff opposition from the "battleship admirals," who distrusted air power. However, his concept of the fast carrier strike force was later adopted by Admiral Chester Nimitz. The Pacific War was essentially won by Navy task forces built around 16 aircraft carriers of the Essex and Independence classes supported by escort carriers called baby flattops.
12. For Yamamoto's radio silence order of November 25, 1941, see SRN 116866, RG 457, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. The order applied to all categories of Japanese naval units including the First Air Fleet, the carrier force assigned to the Pearl Harbor raid. During the Hawaii attack the First Air Fleet was combined with the Sixth Fleet. Japan named the force the Kido Butai. According to the Kenkyuska Dictionary, Harvard University Press, 1942: Kido means "have the entree," p. 936; butai means "fighting force," p. 129. Joseph Rochefort's translation from his Oral History, loc. cit., is, "Strike Force."
13. In this book, the term "US cryptographers" includes the Navy's radio intercept operators, who, by intercepting the Japanese naval messages, collectively participated in solving Japan's naval call sign code, the Yobidashi Fugo. Duane Whitlock, one of the three traffic analysts at Station CAST, explained to the author that the call sign system, combined with Japanese naval communication procedures and radio direction finder bearings, revealed Japan's military strategy. Whitlock insisted, that while the information he used in his 1941 analyses came from the 5-Num dispatches (he called them 5-Digit), none of the cryptologists at Station CAST had the means to read the encoded message text prior to Pearl Harbor because the solutions had not been received from Station US in Washington, DC. Whitlock told the author during a telephone interview in May 1999 that in 1941 he was unaware of three crucial US

- cryptographic breakthroughs: (1) Agnes Driscoll's team of cryptographers in Washington had solved the 5-Num code and published the solutions as Radio Intelligence Publication 73 (RIP 73); (2) his immediate boss, Lieutenant John Lietwiler, had brought 5-Num solutions to CAST in the fall of 1941; and (3) Admiral Thomas Hart had assured the Chief of Naval Operations on March 5, 1941 that the British cryptology unit at Singapore had provided the US Asiatic Fleet with solutions to portions of the 5-Num code. In the interview with the author, Whitlock indicated that the solutions of the 5-Num code described by Admiral Hart and RIP 73 had been rendered obsolete by changes to the code instituted by Japan later in 1941. Whitlock emphasized that prior to Pearl Harbor, all Japanese military information gained from the 5-Num intercepts at Station CAST came from analyzing the communications data and the radio call signs. Telephone interview of Captain Duane Whitlock by the author, May and June 1999, in author's file.
14. The American intercept operators knew the Japanese Bureau of Military Preparations by its three-kana radio call sign, E O NO. Stations CAST and HYPO, using IBM statistical machines, established a normal rate of Japanese naval transmissions for each command, daily, weekly, etc. Every Japanese radio call sign intercepted by the cryptographers, such as E O NO, was punched into separate IBM cards for processing and the resulting tally established a norm. Rochefort said he used hundreds of thousands of the punch cards by December 7, 1941 (see his Oral History at US Naval Institute, loc. cit.). Readers can find the E O NO intercepts dated September to December 1941 in Record Groups 457 and 38, MMRB, Archives II, and in the author's files.
 15. For examples of Japan's China recall dispatches obtained by Rochefort's staff, see Joseph Rochefort's Daily Communications Summaries (COMSUMS) issued between September 4 and 8, 1941 in RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II. He first noted the recall in his September 4, 1941 summary (see Note 9, this chapter). Admiral Kimmel usually initialed each summary. Abridged versions of Rochefort's Daily Communication Summary can be found in the 39 volumes of the Joint Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbor Attack, 1945-46. The original complete set of summaries prepared and delivered each day to Admiral Kimmel between July 15, 1941 and December 6, 1941 was not published in its entirety. The original set can be found in RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II. An abridged version introduced before the Congressional investigators can be found in Exhibit 115 (PHPT 17, p. 2601 ff.), but it includes only November 1 to December 6, 1941. Exhibit 115-A contains December 9 and 10, 1941, ibid. p. 2673. Another abridged version can be found in PHPT 37, pp. 706 to 778 which contains breaks in continuity between pp. 729 and 739. While this book refers to the Rochefort summaries, each report reflects the combined efforts of the entire organization of the Mid-Pacific Communications Intelligence Network (MIDPAC). At Station HYPO, the headquarters of the MIDPAC network, traffic analysts Lieutenant Commander Thomas A. Huckins and Lieutenant John A. Williams generally wrote the summaries, according to Wilfred J. Holmes in Double Edged Secrets (Naval Institute Press, 1979), p. 18.
 16. For Admiral Koga's message of September 1, 1941, see Station H intercept file, RG 457, MMRB, Archives II, SRN 117554; for a sample of other Japanese commands departing China, see SRN 117392 (Submarine Squadron Six's departure on September 4); SRN 117531 (commander-in-chief of Third Fleet's departure from China on September 5); SRN 117506 (arrival of Sea Plane Tender Division 12 at Sasebo on September 6), etc.
 17. All of Japan's land-based naval air activity was concentrated in the Eleventh Air Fleet. About 564 aircraft were assigned, plus two seaplane squadrons which operated from sea-based tenders. At the start of the Pacific War the might of the Eleventh Air Fleet was concentrated in Air Flotillas 21, 22, 23, veterans of the China campaign, and Air Flotilla 24 based in the Central Pacific. See Campaigns of the Pacific War (United States Strategic Bombing Survey, USGPO 1946), p. 74.
 18. At the time this book goes to press in 1999, English versions of the China recall messages issued by Japanese naval forces can be found (not in chronological order and with the naval code designator blacked out) in RG 457, MMRB, Archives II, in a file called SRN (Special Research Navy). A destroyer squadron is usually made up of four divisions, which contain four destroyers each. DESRON 5 then contained 16 destroyers plus a light cruiser as flagship, and supporting auxiliaries.
 19. See Homer Kisner's audio tape interview with author, April 1988, at Carlsbad, California, transcript and tapes in author's file.
 20. For the separation of Japanese carrier commands, see Station H Chronology, November 1941, supervised and written by Homer Kisner, traffic chief. A complete report containing Kisner's Daily Chronology, Supervisor Reports, Movement Reports, and Radio Call Signs can be found in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. An abridged version comprising dates of December 1 to 6, 1941, is in PHPT 37, pp. 725 to 728. Kisner's interview with author at Carlsbad, California, April 1988, transcript and tapes in author's file.
 21. See Arthur McCollum's merchant marine recall memorandum to all Navy commandants, Confidential Serial 016916 of February 17, 1940, in RG 181, COM 14 confidential file, National Archives, San Bruno, CA. McCollum used his secret code name F-2 on the memo. Declassified October 3, 1991 by author's FOIA request.
 22. For the Berne List, see RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. American listening posts, operated by the US

- Navy, followed Tokyo Time when intercepting and recording Japanese naval communications. However, radio broadcasts originated by the US Navy were recorded in Greenwich Mean Time (GMT) in the pre-Pearl Harbor era.
23. For an example of the confusion on Japanese communication procedures by historians, see Telford Taylor, New York Times Magazine, April 29, 1984, p. 113. For identification of the Akagi's radio call signs—before the attack—see Station H report for November 1941; tactical call 8 YU NA p. 133; Akagi's administrative call SE YA Ø, p. 104; in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II.
 24. For pre-Pearl Harbor intercept training concerning the On-the-Roof-Gang, see RG 457, SRH 355 (Special Research History), Vols. 1 and 2, MMRB, Archives II.
 25. For Stark's "probably involves war" warning, see CNO to CINCAF, CINCPAC, CINCLANT, COM 15, SPENAVO—London. Secret Serial 031939 of July 3, 1941 in FOIA released to author by US Navy Security Group Command, August 31, 1993, author's file (presumably also released to Archives II in January 1995); see also Admiral Kimmel acknowledging the warning in PHPT 6, p. 2629. SPENAVO was the acronym for America's Special Naval Observer based in London, with liaison to the British Admiralty and Prime Minister Winston Churchill.
 26. For Stark's message on the rapid withdrawal of Japan's merchant marine, see CNO dispatch Serial 142155 with information copies to COM 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, in FOIA, Naval Security Group Command release, loc. cit. West Coast naval districts in 1941 included the Eleventh (COM 11), in San Diego, Vice Admiral Charles A. Blakely; Twelfth (COM 12) in San Francisco, Vice Admiral John Greenslade; and Thirteenth (COM 13) in Seattle, Vice Admiral Charles S. Freeman.
 27. For Kimmel's written instruction to Layton concerning the Heiyo Maru, see RG 80, PHLO file, September 27, 1941, Pacific Fleet Incoming Message File in microfiche section, MMRB, Archives II. The message originator was COM 13 on September 27, 1941, see Serial 271911 with the Action address as OPNAV and the INFO addressees as COM 12 (San Francisco) and 14 (Hawaii) in CINCPAC Confidential Incoming Message File, PHLO, RG 80, MMRB, Archives II. The author found the image on a microfiche, which indicated rapid deterioration of the original. Congress cut National Archives funding in 1995, hampering efforts to preserve crucial Pearl Harbor documents. The author made 35-mm copies on Kodak T-Max black-and-white film of pertinent dispatches in the PHLO microfiche reels. The Heiyo Maru used three different radio call signs (Yobidashi Fugo) during this period. Station SAIL (Seattle) reported her using JRXB from the Berne list. Station BAKER (Guam) reported the vessel used call letters of SA TE Ø in October but changed to HE NU 2 on November 1, 1941; source: Station S monthly report for November 1941. The vessel was also heard by Stations AE (Sitka, Alaska) and ITEM (Imperial Beach, CA). See WCCI report in COM 13 files for November 1941, RG 181, National Archives, Seattle, WA. For Station BAKER TESTM of November 14, 1941, see TESTM files in RG 38, Station US papers, Archives II.
 28. On the pouring in of building materials and laborers for construction of Japanese bases in Central Pacific, see Communications Summaries, September and October 1941, PHLO, loc. cit. Some historians assert that Japan began building war bases in the Central Pacific in the late 1930s and that aviatrix Amelia Earhart was sent to overfly the bases in 1937 and take photographs. However, according to Station H intercepts, Japan did not begin construction of the Central Pacific military bases until late 1940 and early 1941. See the intercepts in RG 457, SRN file, MMRB, Archives II for August through November 1941, also author's file.
 29. For the "peculiar" 5-Num dispatch report of September 24, 1941, see COMSUM of that date in RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II, also author's file.
 30. For Rochefort's "not to exploit" quote to Senator Ferguson, see PHPT 10, p. 4697.
 31. For the Keibii report see the September 24, 1941 COMSUM, RG 80, PHLO, Box 41, MMRB, Archives II. The Japanese word keibii can mean defense; guard; guarding; police; a guard ship; a garrison, per Kenkyuska New Japanese-English Dictionary (Harvard University Press, 1942), p. 893. For the 5-Num message dates cited by Rochefort in his 1941 summaries, see the Communications Summaries in PHLO, RG 80, Box 41, MMRB, Archives II. But 28 years later in his 1969 interview with Commander Kitchen (see Note 2 in this chapter) Rochefort switched gears and implied he and his staff only worked on a Japanese naval system he called AD: Rochefort (p. 109 of ROH): "Yes, you see, originally—without getting into too much of the details of it, some of it is still classified I would imagine—we were assigned responsibility when I took over there for one system which was not the system that Washington was working on. Washington and Cavite [sic, it was Station CAST on Corregidor] were working on what the Navy called the JN—for Japanese Navy, 25. This was the system" [sic, in 1941 the system was known as the 5-Num code, not JN-25].

Later in the series of interviews, Rochefort told Commander Kitchen that in 1941 he and his staff were assigned "a basic responsibility of solving the Japanese naval system which we called AD" (see ROH, p. 134). Rochefort's description of the AD code appears to be a cover story. According to Station US records, the AD code was used by Japan's navy for administrative matters, not operations. It was in effect from January 1, 1938 to November 30, 1940. (See Radio Intelligence Publication 54 A and B, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, pp. 608, 609.) The AD code appears to have been discontinued by Japan's navy by December 1940. On October 31, 1941 Leigh Noyes, the Director of Naval Communications, wrote that the AD code was in effect until October 1940 and that it was used by all Japanese naval units for administrative matters not covered by special systems. Copies of the AD code's decryption details were sent to Stations CAST and HYPO, and to Admirals Hart in Manila and Kimmel in Hawaii. Noyes's letter is published in the US Navy's Registered Intelligence Publication 32 (RIP 32) which he released on October 31, 1941. See RG 38, Station US papers, RIP 32 file, section 23, MMRB, Archives II. There are no AD code messages in President Carter's document release of 1979 housed in RG 457, MMRB, Archives II.

Edwin Layton, in his book And I Was There (William Morrow, 1985), had a different account concerning Station HYPO's cryptographic efforts in the fall of 1941. He writes (p. 77) that Station HYPO concentrated on the Japanese navy's NL system until the second week of December 1941. He wrote that it consumed many thousands of valuable hours of cryptanalytic effort with no intelligence return. Layton's claim is not substantiated in President Carter's 1979 release of Japanese intercepts. There are no NL intercepts in Carter's release. According to Radio Intelligence Publication (RIP) 32 ibid., above, the NL code was the Japanese navy's encryption system for the Intelligence Office, Hydrographic Office, and Radio Stations of the South Sea Island Network (Central Pacific); see October 31, 1941 edition of RIP 32, p. 23.2, in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. SMS 001 means "Secret Message Series number one" and indicates that it is the first radio message originated by the newly organized Keibii 52. The specific message was not found in President Carter's release of 1979.

None of the printed reports published by the nine Pearl Harbor investigations reproduced the entire set of Rochefort's Daily Communication Summaries (COMSUMS) which date from July 15 to December 31, 1941. The original and complete set, including the dates of September 24 and 28, 1941—which were initialed by Admiral Kimmel—can be found in the PHLO files, Box 41, MMRB, Archives II. It is complete from July 15, 1941 to December 6, 1941 but beware: the radio direction finder bearings for July, August, September, and October which were intended to be seen by Admiral Kimmel, have been crudely cut from the documents. Another set of the COMSUMS dated from October 14 to December 14, 1941—in printed form—is published in the Hewitt Investigation as PHPT 37, p. 739. RDF bearings are included from October 14 to 22, but missing from October 23–December 14, 1941. The Clausen Investigation printed the COMSUMS as Exhibit A dated from November 1 to December 6, 1941, as PHPT 35, p. 62. The RDF bearings are missing. The Congressional Investigation printed the COMSUMS as Exhibit 115 on PHPT 17, p. 2601. They are also dated November 1, 1941 to December 6, 1941; the RDF bearings are also missing.

32. For the COMSUM of September 28, 1941, see RG 80, PHLO, loc. cit. For background on Japanese troop movement to the Central Pacific, see intercept of September 8, 1942 Tokyo Time, Station H operator WK, who is unidentified as of the writing of this book, intercepted a message to the Fourth Fleet from the Tokyo Bureau of Military Affairs. The message provides military details on the composition of Guard Divisions (Keibii) 51, 52 and 53. While there is no proof that the Japanese message text could be read in 1941, it indicates that each unit consisted of 16 warrant officers and 374 petty officers and men, listed their armament, and said the three units would be transported to the Central Pacific early in October. Rochefort did not specifically mention this dispatch in his September COMSUMS, though his knowledge of the Keibii units probably derived from this dispatch. See RG 457, SRN 117804, MMRB, Archives II.
33. For details on the Wake Island battle, see Stan Cohen, Enemy on Island, Issue in Doubt (Missoula, Montana: Pictorial Histories Publishing Co., 1983). On January 12, 1942, the Nitta Maru arrived at Wake, picked up American survivors, and transported them to POW camps.
34. For Rochefort reporting his interception of 5-Num code messages in September, October, and November 1941, see his COMSUM for those months in RG 80, Box 41, PHLO, loc. cit.
35. According to Rochefort's Oral History (ROH), he forwarded important Japanese naval intercepts to Washington by radio dispatch, others by US air mail. See ROH, US Naval Institute Oral History Program, Annapolis; copy in author's file.
36. See the intercepts of the Heiyo Maru in RG 457, SRN file for October and November 1941, MMRB, Archives II; also author's file.
37. See Note 27 in this chapter for monitoring stations that tracked the Heiyo Maru.
38. For the radio call signs, SA TE Ø and HE NU 2, see Note 27, in this chapter.
39. For proof that the Heiyo Maru originated the radio message on November 22, 1941, see the intercept by Jack Kaye (sine JK), SRN 117245 at 1546 hours Tokyo Time in RG 457, SRN file, MMRB, Archives II. In May 1999, Kaye, a retired US Navy captain, confirmed that his operator sine at Station H was JK in 1941. Kaye could not recall the intercept. "I was never told of the contents of the messages I intercepted. It was on a need to know basis and I didn't need to know." Kaye e-mail to author, May 1999, author's file.
40. For Washington, DC visits of Vincent Murphy, War Plans Officer for Admiral James Richardson in 1940 and later assistant war plans officer for Admiral Kimmel, see James Richardson, On the Treadmill to Pearl Harbor (Naval History Division, Department of the Navy, 1973), pp. 288, 307, 308, 383. For Murphy's meeting with Secretary of the Navy Frank Knox and Admirals Stark and Ingersoll in October 1940, see pp. 339, 400. Recalled to Washington by Admiral Stark in November 1940, see PHPT 14, pp 962, 980, 982, 983; see also letter Stark to Kimmel regarding Murphy's visits to Washington in PHPT 16, 2145.

41. For Rochefort's quote "concentrating far greater," see COMSUM of November 20 and 21, 1941 p. 2.
42. On Admiral Kimmel's concerns for the Japanese advance on Hawaii, see his alert sent to Washington, November 25, 1941 in chapter 10 of this book. See also a report dated November 25, 1941 concerning the arrival of Japanese Central Pacific landing forces together with arrival of Marus in the Marshall Islands, PHPT 14, p. 1365.
43. For the B-24 photo mission, see PHPT 7-2996; also PHPT 24-1780, 1781, 1826, 1827.
44. For confirmation that the B-24 was 100 percent destroyed, see PHPT 24-1833.

1. See COM 14 secret serial Z-2051 of Oct. 8, 1941, in NA, Seattle, COM 13, A6-2 file of DCO route slip 029, declassified Oct. 9, 1985. All of Joseph Rochefort's written orders of 1941 carried the designator Z to indicate secret communications intelligence (COMINT) dictum.
2. For lookout for tankers, see Communications Summary (COMSUM), July 15, 1941 in RG 80, Box 41, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II.
3. For the Katsuriki in the Gilberts, see Station H, RDF bearings for October 1941, RG 38, Station US papers, Archives II.
4. See Joseph Rochefort's COMSUMs of Oct. 21 and 22, p. 2. Admiral Nishizo Tsukahara assumed command of the Eleventh Air Fleet at Yokohama Air Station on September 10, according to Station CAST intercept, SRN 117447 in RG 457, SRN file, MMRB, Archives II. Rochefort referred to the Eleventh Air Fleet as the Combined Air Force.
5. See COMSUM of October 21 and 22, 1941. loc. cit.
6. See PHPT 14, p. 1057; PHPT 2, pp. 560, 561, 679; also Joseph Grew, Ten Years in Japan (Simon & Schuster, 1944), pp. 470, 497. On the unnamed informant, see The Magic Background of Pearl Harbor (US Department of Defense, USGPO), Vol. IV, pp. N 11-13, items 14-17.
7. Japanese Foreign Ministers were in shaky political positions during 1941. Shigenori Togo was the third Foreign Minister appointed in 1941; Yosuke Matsuoka, January to July, Admiral Teijiro Toyoda, July to October, and Togo October onward.
8. For Smith-Hutton's schedule see RG 457, SRN 116271, Archives II, copy in author's file. Intercepted by Chester Howard at Station H on October 31, 1941. After Smith-Hutton applied for a land travel permit from the Japanese Naval Ministry, Admiral Yamamoto was provided with Smith-Hutton's itinerary. The attaché was fluent in Japanese. His experience with the Japanese navy was unique. He was on personal and friendly terms with most of Japan's commanding naval officers. Smith-Hutton was closely associated with USN communications intelligence—he served at Station CAST in 1937 and was US Asiatic Fleet Intelligence Officer in 1938.
9. For Grew's "no substantial warning," see his testimony in PHPT 14, p. 1059.
10. See Rear Admiral Richmond K. Turner's discussion of the Vacant Sea order in PHPT 4, p. 1942. The significance of his admission that the North Pacific was cleared for the Japanese carrier force did not register with Congress or with the news media covering the 1945–46 investigation.
11. The Vacant Sea order was authored by Rear Admiral Royal Ingersoll, Assistant Chief of Naval Operations, and can be found in PHPT 12, p. 317. The order was issued after Admiral Kimmel disputed an earlier Vacant Sea order of Nov. 22, which interfered with his plans to have the Pacific Fleet patrolling the North Pacific waters starting Sunday Nov. 23. See Kimmel's protest: CINCPAC to OPNAV, Serial 220417 of Nov. 22, 1941 in RG 38, PHLO, Archives II.
12. Robinson Jeffers, "Pearl Harbor," in Articles of War (University of Arkansas Press, 1990). Reprinted by permission of the University of Arkansas Press.
13. See PacFleet employment schedule for Second Quarter, 1941–42 fiscal year, in PHPT 26, items section.
14. For Rear Admiral Richmond K. Turner's testimony that 25 years of US Army and Navy training taught that Japan would plan an air raid on Hawaii, see PHPT 4, p. 1963.
15. King's exercise was called Fleet Problem Nineteen and got underway March 14, 1938. See Fleet Admiral King, A Naval Record (W. W. Norton, 1952), pp. 281–282. For Alan Kirk's description of Fleet Problem 19, see his oral history, The Reminiscences of Alan Goodrich Kirk. (Oral History Office, Butler Library, Columbia University, NY 1962) p. 119, copy of entire OH, in author's file. Beware: Kirk has the wrong date for King's exercise. It was 1938, not 1937.
16. For Admiral Kimmel's Easy Cast Easy order, see CINCPAC order 37-41 of Nov. 5, 1941, Confidential A-4-3/FF12 [1], serial 01801, RG 313, Archives II. The report contains supporting files from various Pacific Fleet warships and commanders involved in Exercise 191, copy in author's file.
17. For quote of F. W. Purdy, see deck log of the USS California of Nov. 7, RG 24, PHLO, Archives II, copy in author's file.
18. "Catalina" was the name given to Navy twin engine patrol aircraft built by Consolidated and designated PBY. PB = patrol boat; Y = Consolidated Aircraft Corp. See NOAA chart 19007 for "Classical" seamount locations, duplicate in author's file.

19. For Admiral Kimmel's "no radio" order of November 17, 1941, see PacFlt Flag file, RG 80, PHLO, Archives II.
20. For the scenario of Exercise 191, see CINCPAC Flag file serial 172118 of Nov. 17, 1941, RG 80, PHLO, and RG 313, Archives II, copies in author's file.
21. See Anderson-Greber memos, Nov. 19–21, in RG 313, Exercise 191 file A-16-3, Archives II, copy in author's file.
22. Ibid.
23. The USS Tennessee action report said the cancellation signal was FOX CAST DOG and was received at 3:47 P.M. Hawaii Standard Time. See RG 313, Exercise 191, file A-16-3, Archives II, copy in author's file.
24. The warning that halted the war games came from the Deputy Chief of Naval Operations, Rear Admiral Royal Ingersoll, who dispatched the order to Kimmel at 3:05 P.M., Washington time. According to Admiral Harold Stark, it reached Hawaii sometime after 1:35 P.M., Monday November 24, 1941; See PHPT 5-2438. For Greenwich Mean Time coordinated with the other time zones of the world, see time chart in PHPT 12, p. 340 ff.
25. See Admiral Stark's letter of September 23, 1941 to Admiral Kimmel advising of President Roosevelt's Pacific shooting policy, PHPT 33, p. 1168. Admiral Kimmel's comments, loc. cit.
26. See prediction of General George C. Marshall that a US-Japan war would break out during the first ten days of December 1941 in Chapter 10 herein.
27. See Admiral "Bull" Halsey's order 112-41 in RG 313, Archives II. The circumstances concerning the cancellation of Halsey's plan 112-41 have never been explained. He did not discuss the plan in his autobiography Admiral Halsey's Story (McGraw-Hill, 1947) nor did a separate biography, E. B. Potter, Bull Halsey (Naval Institute Press, 1985).
28. For Admiral Kimmel's disregard of Washington's injunction as faulty, see PHPT 6, p. 2713.
29. The USS Lexington and her battle group, composed of America's newest warships, was supposedly dispatched to Midway on a mission similar to Halsey's: deliver 18 fighter planes. She never delivered the planes. Normally the Navy's peacetime deck logs listed the specific destination of the vessel. According to the log entry by Lieutenant [j.g.] T. J. Nixon, the carrier was en route to "an assigned area." Between December 5 and 7 the log indicates the flattop remained in the Hawaii time zone [+10 1/2 GMT] until Monday morning, December 8 when she entered the +11 (GMT) time zone [Midway] at 10:50 A.M.

The Task Force commander, Rear Admiral John Newton, testified before the Hart Proceedings that he canceled the Midway delivery on December 7 shortly after he learned of the Pearl Harbor raid. He did not explain what he was doing in the Midway area a day later, nor his reaction to the shelling of Midway by two Japanese destroyers on the night of December 7. For the Lexington's deck log, see RG 24, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. Newton account of canceling the flight to Midway, see PHPT 26-344 (Hart Proceedings).

30. For Senator Barkley's question to Stark, and for Stark's reply, "No specific dates," see PHPT 5, p. 2197.
31. For "transportation on aircraft carrier" dispatch from Stark, see serial 270038 of November 26, Washington Time, PHPT 17-2479. For Stark's documentation, see PHPT 5, pp. 2160-63. On October 17, Stark ordered Kimmel to take all practical precautions for the safety of airfields on Wake and Midway islands to protect flights of B-17 bombers headed for the Philippines. In compliance, Kimmel directed Halsey to plan for transporting 12 fighters to Wake and 18 to Midway. Instead, the transport plan was sidetracked on November 24 when Halsey planned to locate an enemy carrier force. But on November 26, Washington sidetracked the sidetrack and placed the deliveries to Wake and Midway back on the schedule; see PHPT 17-2534; PHPT 5-2160.
32. For Admiral Kimmel's directive to Layton/Rochefort, "Find The Criers," see PHPT 10-4834. Testimony of Edwin Layton to JOINT, Feb. 18, 1946, questioned by Seth W. Richardson, general counsel.
33. For November identification of the Akagi as 8 YU NA, see Station H November 1941 report, p. 133; Station CAST made the identical ID in the TESTM reports, November 1941. Both reports in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, and in author's file.
34. For Dutch cryptographers locating Japanese warships in the Kuriles, see Lt. General Hein ter Poorten's letter of July 23, 1960, Royal Netherlands Army Archives, The Hague, copy in author's file. In 1941 General ter Poorten was commander of the Dutch Army forces in the Netherlands East Indies.
35. General John Magruder was a former head of Army Intelligence and, at the time, an ally of the Navy's Intelligence Director, Walter Anderson. Both met with Roosevelt in the Oval Office in 1939. Magruder's mission to China across the Pacific in September and October 1941 received full publicity and was dutifully reported to Tokyo by Honolulu Consul-General Nagao Kita.
36. Australia and the United States secretly set up Pacific Base F at Rabaul, New Britain on October 25, 1941; see CNO secret letter serial 0119912; also Navy Bureau of Ordnance A-16-a[2] PL, same date. On December 12, 1941 the development of Base F was indefinitely postponed by OPNAV serial 0134730. In RG 181-58-3223, NA, San Bruno, California. Japan seized Rabaul in the spring of 1942.

1. The account of the US Army's secret conference held with selected members of the print media on November 15, 1941 at 10:15 A.M. in the Munitions Building is based on a memorandum written by Time magazine military correspondent, Robert Sherrod for his New York editor, David W. Hulburd, Jr. Sherrod wrote that the War Department invited the reporters to the secret conference. According to Sherrod's memo, General Marshall told the reporters he had called them together as "there were some things he had to tell to key press correspondents in order that their interpretations of current and forthcoming events did not upset key military strategy of the United States." After the war, Marshall told Hanson Baldwin, military writer for the New York Times, that the gist of Sherrod's account "is apparently correct." Reporters who complied with the secrecy rule were: Robert Sherrod, Time; Ernest K. Lindley, Newsweek; Charles W. B. Hurd, New York Times; Bert Andrews, New York Herald Tribune; Lyle P. Wilson, United Press; Edward Bomar, Associated Press; and Harold Slater, International News Service. None of the radio news reporters were invited to the conference. See Larry Bland, ed., The Papers of George Catlett Marshall (John Hopkins University Press, 1986), Vol. 2, p. 676 ff. For Short's questioning of Marshall's ethics in not telling him, see PHPT 7, p. 2960.
2. General Marshall did not disclose the specific source of his information to the correspondents that Japan would attack the United States during the first ten days of December 1941. Since Marshall revealed that his source was intercepted and decoded Japanese radio messages, the author looked for confirmation in Army and Navy communications intelligence records. On November 5 and 9, 1941, Admiral Osami Nagano, Chief of the Japanese Navy's General Staff (a title similar to the Chief of Naval Operations in the United States held by Admiral Harold Stark), sent radio messages to Admiral Isoroku Yamamoto, Commander-in-Chief of the Imperial Japanese Navy: "In view of the fact that it is feared war has become unavoidable with the United States, Great Britain and the Netherlands and for self-preservation and future of the Empire, the various preparation for war operations will be completed by the first part of December." Admiral Nagano also transmitted by radio a copy of the dispatch to the Commander-in-Chief of Japan's China Area Fleet, according to a US Navy publication, The Campaigns of the Pacific War (USGPO 1946), p. 49, published by the Naval Analysis Division of the United States Strategic Bombing Survey. None of Admiral Nagano's dispatches of the early November, 1941 time period intercepted by the United States monitor stations have been released to the National Archives, according to John Taylor, archivist in charge of the Japanese naval intercepts in Archives II. However, evidence found by the author in US navy records of Station HYPO indicates radio messages from Admiral Nagano were intercepted in Hawaii during the period of November 5 to 13, 1941. Joseph Rochefort, commander of HYPO, wrote in his Communications Summary (COMSUM) that his intercept operators obtained radio dispatches originated by the Chief of Japan's Naval General Staff (Admiral Nagano) addressed to at least three Japanese naval commands: 1. Admiral Isoroku Yamamoto, Commander-in-Chief of the Imperial Navy, 2. Commander-in-Chief of Japan's China Area Fleet, 3. chief of staff of Japan's carrier divisions, and other naval commands. Rochefort wrote that a series of high priority radio dispatches originated by Admiral Nagano were intercepted by his staff between November 5 and 13, 1941. See Rochefort's COMSUMS for November 5 and 13, 1941, pp. 198, 206, in RG 80 PHLO, MMRB, Archives II, copies in author's file.

Admiral Nagano sent two radio messages on November 5 in the Japanese Navy's "kana code," according to Rochefort's COMSUM on November 5, 1941, page 198. Apparently these two messages that indicated war with the United States would begin the first part of December were the source of Marshall's press briefing. On November 25, President Franklin D. Roosevelt announced to his War Cabinet that: "We were likely to be attacked perhaps (as soon as) next Monday (December 1), for the Japanese are notorious for making an attack without warning. . .," according to the diary of Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, in PHPT 11, p. 5433 (double parentheses by author). Nagano's intercepts of November 5, which indicated war would start by the first part of December, were forwarded to Station US in Washington for decryption and translation, according to US Navy communications intelligence policy. The communication circumstances of the November 5, 1941 Japanese naval intercepts, their forwarding to Washington, and their apparent decryption and translation while in the nation's capital fit into a time frame sufficient to reach General Marshall for his November 15 press briefing and for President Roosevelt's war discussion with his cabinet on November 25, 1941.

Only one of Admiral Nagano's Secret Message Series of 1941 has been released to the National Archives. It is SMS 843 that Nagano originated on November 1, 1941, and was intercepted at Station H by Radioman Second Class J. P. Olson. At least 842 of Nagano's messages are missing from the Station H files, plus those that Roche-fort indicated were intercepted at Station H between November 5 and 13, 1941.

3. On the visits of Princess Martha of Norway, see the White House Usher Book and Trips and Itineraries of the President under these dates: Princess Martha at the White House on June 15, 1941; see Trip of the President aboard the USS Potomac with Princess Martha, August 1941. Near Cape Cod Roosevelt left the Potomac and transferred to the USS Augusta for the Churchill meeting; dinner with Princess Martha on November 25, 1941. For the full schedule of Princess Martha's visits with President Roosevelt, see the White House Usher Book for 1940 through 1941. All recorded in the White House Usher Book, FDRL, Hyde Park, NY, copy in author's file.
4. See Uritski file, record card 1283; Azerbaijan card 3019, San Francisco Maritime Museum, San Francisco, California. See also Bar Pilots' records, Columbia River Museum, Astoria, Oregon, copies author's file. See radio message sent to Admiral Nagumo dated November 28, 1941 warning that his warships might encounter the Uritski and Azerbaijan in RG 457, SRN 16667, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
5. See Grace Tully, F.D.R. My Boss (Charles Scribner's Sons, 1949), pp. 23–24; FDR addressing the Princess as "child," p. 23, and Lieutenant Commander Fox as White House pharmacist p. 148, ibid. Princess Martha addressing the President as "Dear Godfather," see Joseph P. Lash, Eleanor and Franklin (W. W. Norton, 1971), p. 677. Information on Pooks Hill courtesy of Jane C. Sween, Montgomery County Historical Society, Rockville, MD.
6. The fortieth parallel of north latitude crosses the United States from Cape Mendocino, California, through Denver, Indianapolis, and Philadelphia. Nagumo's concentration of the carriers at the center of the Japanese fleet indicates that Japan's navy was years ahead of the US Navy in recognizing the military might of a Fast Carrier Task Force. Japan placed her carriers in the central position surrounded by other warships in outward formations for protective anti-aircraft roles. In pre-Pearl Harbor maneuvers USN battleships and cruisers were the stars of the fleet and moved separately from the carriers.
7. See Admiral Yamamoto's radio silence order SRN 116866 in RG 457, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
8. Commander Minoru Genda's written statement to the author dated November 22, 1982, author's file. After the war, Japanese voters elected him to the Diet (Parliament). Genda died on the forty-fourth anniversary of VJ-Day, Aug. 15, 1989.
9. For Edwin Layton on radio silence, see PHPT 10, p. 4904; see also Layton's comments on radio silence to the Roberts Commission, PHPT 23, p. 660.
10. Brig. Gen. Telford Taylor's article was published in the New York Times Magazine, April 29, 1984, p. 120. Taylor was US Chief of Counsel and prosecutor for the Nuremberg (Germany) War Crimes Trials of 1946–49. He died May 1998.
11. The Don Whitehead quote is from Don Whitehead, The FBI Story (Random House, 1956), p. 181.
12. Undated written report of Commander W. J. Sebald, COMINT aide to Fleet Admiral Ernest J. King, Chief of Naval Operations, folder 5830/6, RG 38, Station US papers, declassified January 28, 1995, MMRB, Archives II.
13. For interception of Admiral Nagumo's "extensive radio communications" as he departed Hitokappu Bay, see Joseph Rochefort's Communications Summary (COMSUM) of November 25, 1941, RG 80, PHLO, Box 41, Archives II. All of the original COMSUMS prepared by Station HYPO's staff for Admiral Kimmel and dated from July 15 to December 6, 1941 can be found filed together in Box 41, loc. cit. The PHLO files contain the original Kimmel copy with the admiral's notations and his initials, HEK.
14. For the tracking of Vice Admiral Mitsumi Shimizu, the commander of Japan's submarine fleet, from Japan, south past the Bonin islands, then eastward to the Marshall islands, see series of daily COMSUM, prepared by Rochefort and his staff, dated November 25 through December 6, 1941 in RG 80, PHLO, Box 41, loc. cit. See also the Code Movement Reports, Station H, Nov. 1941, p. 110 ff., in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, and author's file.
15. Please note that the Chronology was prepared by Homer Kisner at Station H located on the windward side of Oahu; it differs from the Daily Communication Summary prepared at Station HYPO in the Pearl Harbor Navy Yard. The Chronology is a summary of the Japanese navy intercepts in the 5-Num code obtained by Station H during a 24-hour period from 8:00 A.M. to 7:59 A.M. For daily totals of Japanese naval message intercepts, see Station H report for November 1941, p. 110, under Nov. 25, 1941 [HST]. Estimate of 1225 intercepts is based on message sheets numbered 91932 to 93124 [1192 messages] and 78710 to 78743 [33 messages] RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. The Daily Chronology and its crucial supporting documents were overlooked by all Pearl Harbor investigations of 1944–46 and the Thurmond-Spence Pearl Harbor probe of 1995.
16. On Homer Kisner being unaware that FDR saw the results of communications intelligence, see Homer Kisner's interview with author, April 1988 and April 1999, author's file. Captain Kisner handled millions of Japanese intercepts during the war years and had forgotten the pre-Pearl Harbor dispatches. He and the author discussed the English translations of the pre-attack dispatches released by President Carter in 1979, but not the original Japanese versions that he (then a chief radioman) and his men acquired in 1941. The bulk of the original documents—about 98 percent—have not been released as this book goes to press in 1999. Kisner, promoted to commander, served as radio traffic chief and other communication intelligence duties for Admiral Chester Nimitz. He retired from the Navy as a captain.

17. For the November 25, 1941 movement report on Carrier Division Five, see Station H Chronology for November 1941, p. 110 under radio call sign of NA O Ø (The Ø distinguishes zero from the letter). For intercept of The Carriers (Kisner's term capitalized) on 4963 kilocycles, see Station H Chronology of November 26, 1941, Hawaii Time, p. 89. The intercept was made on the evening watch (4 P.M. to midnight) which would correspond to noon to 8 P.M., November 27, 1941 in Japan. Since The Carriers had been under way for over 24 hours, their location was about 200 miles east of Hitokappu Bay in the North Pacific. Full details on the intercept of the carriers is included on Station H message sheet 92095 of November 26, 1941. None of Station H's estimated 143,000 message sheets originated between July 15 and December 6, 1941, have been declassified by the US government as this book goes to press. See Station H Chronology, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
18. See the author's written interview with Harry Hood, January 15, 1986, in author's files. US Navy intercept operators and cryptographers were forbidden to discuss their work with journalists without the supervision of the Naval Security Group Command (NSGC), so the author submitted written questions to Hood in the fall of 1985. The written questions traveled by US Mail in a roundabout way to Hood through the NSGC (successor to Station US) then located on "Antennae Hill," 3801 Nebraska Avenue NW—a high ground point in Washington, DC. (It is called Antennae Hill because TV station WRC and the National Broadcasting Company's transmitting facilities were next door creating an antennae farm that could be seen from most points in the nation's capital. It would be interesting to learn what TV anchor Tom Brokaw and NBC sound technicians intercepted from the US Navy's antennae farm.) Two officials of the NSGC, Commander Irving Newman and George Henriksen, reviewed the author's questions and Hood's answers, then returned the complete interview to the author. Nothing in the written questions and answers was censored. Hood was living in Philadelphia in 1986.
19. For the "broad range of air operations" quote, see Rochefort's COMSUM of October 22, 1941, RG 80, PHLO, Box 41, MMRB, Archives II, and author's file.
20. Earlier in September, citing the "enemy's submarine menace," Rear Admiral Charles Freeman, Commandant of the Thirteenth Naval District (COM 13) in Seattle, wrote that he was ready to provide distant aerial reconnaissance of the North Pacific and the Alaska sector and asked Admiral Harold Stark, the Chief of Naval Operations, for permission to begin the search and "prevent a surprise attack." Freeman never received an OK. See RG 187, COM 13, Confidential Serial 121129 of September 17, 1941, in NA, Seattle, and author's file.
21. For Rochefort's testimony on tracking of Japanese submarines toward Hawaii, see his Daily Communication Summary, November 24, 25, 26, 1941, under sub-heading Fourth Fleet and Mandates. PHLO, RG80, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
22. See the Priority dispatch as received in Washington with Laurance Safford's initials, LFS, in RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II, and author's file.
23. Princess Martha bringing a bottle of Aquavit to the White House, see Grace Tully, F.D.R. My Boss (Charles Scribner's Sons, 1949), p. 23. For the time schedule of the President's dinner with Princess Martha, see White House Usher Book, November 25, 1941, FDRL, Hyde Park, NY, copy author's file. For description of the Oval Study dinners, see William Seale, The President's House (White House Historical Association. 1986), pp. 985–99.
24. The Rochefort-Kimmel-Bloch alert can be fully documented. It was written in Hawaii by Joseph Rochefort (see his testimony to Hart Proceedings, PHPT 26, p. 220, item 32) and dispatched by Radio Pearl Harbor to Washington DC at 1:10 A.M. November 26, 1941, GMT, which was 2:40 P.M., November 25, by Hawaii Time. Next it was received at Station US, where Commander Laurance Stafford initialed the copy shortly after 8:10 P.M. EST. Then Lieutenant Commander Ethelbert Watts, one of McCollum's assistants, prepared the Presidential Monograph 65 (published in PHPT 15, p. 1886 ff.). Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson wrote in his diary that he received a document from the Navy's secret service (his name for the US Navy's intercept operations) the evening of November 25, 1941 and sent it over to the White House. See Stimson diary entry for November 26, 1941 [EST], PHPT 11, p. 5434. See Edwin Layton, PHPT 26, p. 231, item 33, where he confirms that Kimmel authorized sending Rochefort's alert to Washington.
25. For missing monographs, see Richard von Doenhoff's letters to author, March 23, 1994 and April 27, 1995, author's file.
26. For President Roosevelt's daily schedule as recorded by Chief Usher Howell Crim, see White House Usher Book, FDRL, Hyde Park, NY, copy in author's file.
27. For Stimson's "secret service" quote see Note 21, this chapter. Brigadier General Sherman Miles, Army Chief of Intelligence, testified to the Joint Congressional Investigation that he received the message at 12:45 A.M. November 26, 1941. PHPT 14, p. 1366. For the presidential monographs 65, 66, see RG 80, PHLO files, Monographs 65, 66,

- Index Guide 901–200, dated November 26, 1941, MMRB, Archives II, copies in author's file.
28. For Captain John Beardall's delivery of Magic to FDR, see his testimony to the Joint Congressional Investigation of 1945–46 in PHPT 11, p. 5270.
 29. For further confirmation of delivery of intercepted Japanese messages to FDR, see a November 12, 1941 "unofficial memorandum," marked "Dissemination to White House," reportedly written by Lieutenant Commander Alwin D. Kramer (reportedly, see PHPT 11, p. 5475), the Navy's principal White House courier for communications intelligence, in RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
 30. For Kramer discussing delivery of "raw messages" to Roosevelt, see PHPT 9, pp. 3985, 3986. Captain Homer Kisner, radio traffic chief at Station H in 1941, believes Roosevelt did not literally mean "raw messages" for they would have been in Japan's naval 5–Num code or in clear Japanese language and either (1) unreadable or (2) untranslated. Instead, Kisner presumes FDR referred to the Communication Summaries (COMSUMS). See Kisner's taped interview with the author April 22, 1988, in author's files. See testimony of Kramer before Senator Homer Ferguson of the Joint Congressional Investigation of 1945–46. The two discussed delivery of Japanese "raw messages" to President Roosevelt before the attack (PHPT 9, p. 3986):

SENATOR HOMER FERGUSON: "Wasn't it your understanding that the President was personally receiving these raw messages to place his own evaluation on?"

LT. CDR. A. D. KRAMER: "Yes sir."
 31. For description of the leather pouch delivered to FDR, see memorandum of Captain W. B. Braun dated December 18, 1945 to Admiral Theodore Wilkinson in RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II, also in author's file.
 32. For FDR meeting with Admiral King and later swim with Betsey Roosevelt, see White House Usher Book, November 27, 1941, FDRL, Hyde Park, NY, copy in author's file.
 33. For Stimson's quote on his responsibility for carrying out the President's orders, see Stimson's written statement presented to the Joint Congressional Investigation of 1945–46, entitled "Statement of Facts as Shown by My Current Notes and My Recollection as Refreshed Thereby." Statement starts in PHPT 11, p. 5416; his account of carrying out Roosevelt's order will be found on p. 5425. See also Stimson dispatching the war warning order issued under authority of FDR and released for transmission by Brig. Gen. L. T. Gerow on Nov. 27, 1941: "The Secretary of War directs that following message be sent." Reproduced in Appendix C of this book.
 34. For Admiral Ingersoll's war warning on November 27, 1941, see Appendix C of this book.
 35. For the war warning by Admiral Stark on November 28, 1941, see Appendix C of this book.
 36. For Admiral Thomas Hart not interfering with Japan's initial assault on the Philippines, see Clay Blair, Silent Victory (J. B. Lippincott, 1975), p. 158. See also the following observations from a biography of Hart, James Leutze's, A Different Kind of Victory (Naval Institute Press, 1981): he (Hart) had 27 subs submerged in Manila Bay, p. 235; it was Washington, not the Asiatic Fleet Commander (Hart) that directed the fleet to withdraw from Manila," p. 230; Hart was directed by Washington to send US Navy surface forces and submarines southeast toward Australia, p. 237. For examples of MacArthur and Stimson feuding with Hart over lack of US Navy submarine action: MacArthur asked the admiral: "What in the world is the matter with your submarines?" p. 242; MacArthur complained that Hart's inactivity allowed Japan's navy freedom of action, p. 234; according to Stimson, MacArthur felt that Hart's ships and submarines were ineffectual, not because Japan controlled the air but because Hart had lost his courage, p. 240; Hart's reaction to MacArthur's brickbats: "He (MacArthur) is inclined to cut my throat and perhaps the Navy in general," p. 240.
 37. For the replies of Generals Andrews and DeWitt, see Papers of Lt. Gen. Walter Short, Hoover Archives, Stanford University, Stanford, CA.
 38. For General Short's comments on alarming Honolulu civilians see PHPT 7, p. 2985, PHPT 27, p. 283; and targets to shoot, see PHPT 7, pp. 2946, 3015. See also Chapter 4 of The General's Lady, an unpublished manuscript, by Isabel Short, the general's wife, in the Hoover Institution Archives, Stanford University, Stanford, CA, copy in author's file.
 39. For Adjutant General Adams' dispatch to General Short of November 28, 1941, see Appendix C of this book. For Adams' original War Department dispatch 482, as received by Short, see his personal papers, Hoover Institution Archives, Stanford University, Stanford, CA, copy in author's file.

1. Lester R. Schulz was interviewed in writing by the author, Schulz' letters are in the author's file.
2. In 1941 Thanksgiving was celebrated by the nation on November 20. Congress changed the holiday to the third Thursday of November to provide more Christmas shopping days.
3. See the Stimson diary quotes—the original 1941 quotes in PHPT 11, pp. 5433–5435, and an elaboration of the diary provided to the Joint Congressional Investigating Committee in 1945–46, pp. 5421–5427.
4. Ibid.
5. Ibid.
6. On FDR sending a special message to Emperor Hirohito, see Joseph Grew, Ten Years in Japan (Simon & Schuster, 1944), p. 486.
7. For wording of FDR's dispatch to Emperor Hirohito, see ibid., p. 4870.
8. For FDR's quote on "fighting by next Thanksgiving," see the New York Times, November 30, 1941, p. 1.
9. Steve Early quote from New York Times, ibid.; see also Grace Tully, F.D.R. My Boss (Charles Scribner's Sons, 1949), pp. 250, 251.
10. See Grace Tully, F.D.R. My Boss (Charles Scribner's Sons, 1949), p. 205, where the Ferdinand Magellan was designated US Number One. The presidential car was bullet-proof and built of armor plate for the President by the Pullman Company and the American Association of Railroads. According to Tully, the car was placed in service after 1940. On FDR's return to White House, see Tully, F.D.R. My Boss, p. 250.
11. Hoisting a dark gray ball above railroad tracks was a standard procedure of American railroads in 1941. It directed all trains to secondary tracks or sidings for emergency passage of US Number One. In the Jet Age, similar procedures were adopted for Air Force One that clear air traffic routes and airport runway traffic for the presidential aircraft. During the Joint Congressional Investigative Hearing of 1945–46, Congressman Bertrand Gearhart (R., CA) questioned the high-ball return. Undersecretary of State Sumner Welles (the number two man) tried to provide an answer in State Departmentese (PHPT 2, p. 540).

GEARHART: Why did FDR return from Warm Springs so unexpectedly, so precipitously?

MR. WELLES: The instructions given me by the President to communicate the memorandum he had sent me to the two Japanese Ambassadors was one of the reasons, in my judgment at that time, as it is now, which required the President's return in order that he himself could take charge of the communication.
12. See Foreign Minister Shigenori Togo's messages in PHPT 12, pp. 195 (Togo to Ambassador Nomura in Washington, "Don't give impression negotiations broken off," Nov. 28, 1941), 204 (a two-part message from Togo to Ambassador Oshima in Berlin, "Say to Hitler that there is extreme danger war will break out with United States," Nov. 30, 1941), 206 (Togo to Ambassador Oshima in Berlin, "The United States regards Japan as an enemy," Nov. 30, 1941), and 208 (Togo to Ambassador Nomura in Washington, "To keep United States from becoming unduly suspicious say negotiations are continuing," December 1, 1941).
13. For FDR's requests for a copy of the "extreme danger" dispatch, see Herbert Feis, The Road To Pearl Harbor (Princeton University Press, 1950), p. 336.
14. For Rear Admiral Richmond K. Turner's quote, "indication of war," see PHPT 4, p. 2002.
15. For Joseph Rochefort's "looked damn bad" testimony, see Admiral Hart's Proceedings in PHPT 23, p. 687.
16. For observations of Captain Charles McMorris and Commander Vincent Murphy that Pearl Harbor is unlikely to be attacked by Japan, see PHPT 36, p. 455.
17. See Rochefort's Daily COMSUMS from Dec. 1 to 6, 1941 in RG 80, PHLO, Box 41, MMRB, Archives II, and author's file.
18. For Yamamoto's radio messages to the Carriers, see COMSUM of December 6, 1941, RG 80, PHLO, Box 41, MMRB, Archives II, also in author's file.
19. See also Homer Kisner's Chronology for Dec. 5, 1941, which contains the long-distance warning; it may be found in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, and in author's file. Beware of copies printed in the Joint Congressional Hearings; they contain typos. Homer Kisner interviews with the author, April 1988 and 1998, transcripts in author's file.
20. Ibid.
21. Duane Whitlock taped audio interview with author, Danville, California, September 30, 1993, transcript and tapes in author's file.
22. According to the Station US papers in Archives II, there were at least three super secret US Navy code systems for radio dispatch of intercepted Japanese communications intelligence in use in late 1941. Kimmel and Hart held keys

- for these: COPEK, CETYH, and TESTM. Admiral King of the Atlantic Fleet held keys to COPEK and CETYH and possibly TESTM. Manila Time, not GMT, was used for the CAST TESTM dispatches sent to Hawaii, according to Duane Whitlock. Messages sent to MacArthur by CAST were fully decrypted, translated, and delivered to the general's headquarters in Manila by naval officer messenger.
24. For roster of Station H personnel as of July 1941, see Station H monthly report in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
 25. For identification and location of the Japanese carriers Akagi, Zuikaku, Hiryu and the battleship Kirishima, see TESTM dispatches in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, and in author's files.
 26. See transcript of Duane Whitlock's interview, September 30, 1993, Danville, California, audio tape and transcript in author's file; the author conducted additional telephone interviews with Whitlock at Strawberry Point, Iowa, May and June 1999.
 27. See transcript of Whitlock interview, loc. cit.
 28. See Intercept Station "C", authored and published by the Naval Cryptographic Veterans Association for the roster of Station CAST for December 1941. When Japanese troops overran the Bataan Peninsula and threatened Corregidor in the spring of 1942, the CAST personnel were evacuated by Navy submarines to Melbourne and linked up with codebreakers of the Royal Australian Navy. The unit became Fleet Radio Unit Melbourne, with the acronym FRUMEL. Before evacuating Corregidor, they burned all intelligence records and reportedly destroyed their Purple machine by throwing it into Manila Bay.
 29. For operations of the Purple machine at Station CAST, see author's telephone interview with Captain Duane Whitlock at Strawberry Point, Iowa, May, June 1999, in author's file. For same subject on Purple machine, see telephone interview between author and Lieutenant Commander Robert Doud, Oakdale, California, May and June 1999, notes in author's file. Doud told the author that he operated the Purple machine at CAST. For quote that Station CAST personnel worked from same cryptographic quarters, is from Captain Jack Kaye, Santa Ana, California, e-mail to author, June 1999, author's file. In 1941, Kaye worked as intercept operator at Station CAST, then transferred to Station H in Hawaii in October 1941. Kaye to author, email, ibid.
 30. See the original "most reliable order" in Secret serial 242239, 10:39 P.M., GMT or 5:30 P.M., EST, both Nov. 24, 1941, PHLO, RG 80, Archives II. Order bears McCollum's initials at top: sent to Admiral Hart (CINCAF) for action and information to CINCPAC and the US Navy attachés in Shanghai, Chungking, and Tokyo. Beware of the reprint of the message in PHPT 36, p. 650, which dropped McCollum's initials as originator and has minor typos.
 31. See Kisner interview with author, April 1988, transcript, notes, audio tape, photographs, author's file.
 32. See Presidential Monograph file, PHLO, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II. On the night of December 7 (EST), Station CAST located the Akagi in Okinawa and sent the report to Station US. It was an erroneous report, of course, because the Akagi, after attacking Pearl Harbor, escaped to the North Pacific. McCollum routed the report to FDR sometime after 11 P.M. EST. There is no record of its delivery to the White House. Captain Duane Whitlock, one of the traffic analysts at Station CAST, said he did not send the erroneous Akagi/Okinawa report to Washington and did not recall its existence (interviewed by the author September 30, 1993). The author was unable to locate the erroneous Akagi dispatch in President Jimmy Carter's 1979 release of Japanese naval intercepts to Record Group 457 at Archives II. There is no record of Station H intercepting the carrier in the Okinawa region on December 7, 1941, Hawaii Time. Instead, the Station H records show interceptions of the Akagi, north of Oahu on December 7. See Station H operator logs for December 8, 1941 (Tokyo Time) RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. The erroneous report: "DF bearing indicates Akagi moving south from Empire. Now in Nansei Islands area," was sent by radio dispatch to Admiral Kimmel as an information address. It was dispatched from Station CAST at 3:33 A.M. on December 8, 1941, GMT, which is 5:03 P.M. on December 7, 1941 in Hawaii, nine hours after the attack on Pearl Harbor. The erroneous Akagi-bearing report can be found in RG 80, PHLO, Pacific Fleet incoming classified message file, microfiche section, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.

1. See John Toland, Infamy (Doubleday, 1982). For accuracy, RDF bearings must be plotted on great circle charts, not Mercator projections. Electronic signals do not follow a Mercator projection. A great circle chart establishes the shortest distance between any two points on the earth's curved surface; see Merriam Webster's Collegiate Dictionary, 10th edition. Example: the shortest air distance between Chicago and San Francisco is through Laramie, Wyoming, not through Denver, Colorado, as a Mercator map would indicate.
2. See reconstruction of the track chart by Robert Ogg on p. 191 of this book.
3. Robert Ogg, interviewed by the author, 1984–1999; transcripts, notes and correspondence in author's files. Later in the war, Ogg served on the radio communication staff of Admiral Nimitz for the Central and North Pacific campaigns. After the war ended, Ogg entered the US Navy Reserve, and was executive officer of the destroyer USS Shields. He is an emeritus trustee of the University of California (UC) Foundation; chairman of the Finance and Audit Committees, Advisory Board University Research Expedition; Member UC Nimitz Lectureship Committee, Member of UC Chancellor's Circle; Honorary Fellow California Academy of Sciences; Life Fellow, Explorers Club. He is a ninth descendant of John Howland of the Mayflower. He retired from the Navy Reserve as a lieutenant commander. See also Ogg's oral history, Regional Oral History Office, The Bancroft Library, UC Berkeley.
4. According to Webster's Collegiate Dictionary, 10th edition, a williwaw is a "violent gust of cold land air, common along mountainous coasts of high latitudes." A good name for a cold strong drink.
5. For Lieutenant Ellsworth Hosmer's direct link to Station US, see FBI report 62–33413, item 766, copy in author's file.
6. "Be on the lookout for carriers": for confirmation, see Edwin Layton's statement: "Intense watch began Nov. 25, 1941," in PHPT 10, p. 4908.
7. For Ogg's statement, "The best of my memory is that this was in the 4 megacycle range" (i.e., the 4,000-kilocycle band) see his oral history interview of May 4–6, 1983, pp. 35, 39, 42, conducted by Commander Irwin G. Newman of the Naval Security Group Command and published by the US Navy as SRH 255 in RG 457, MMRB, Archives II; also in author's file. See also interviews of Ogg by the author, 1984 to 1999, telephone, correspondence, author's file.
8. On those transmissions being identified in Japan's kana code, see Ogg's comments in SRH 255, loc. cit., pp. 18, 22, 23, 25.
9. Admiral Greenslade, Commander of the Western Sea Frontier and Commandant of the Twelfth Naval District, held keys to GUPID, a Navy communications intelligence system similar to COPEK, CETYH, and TESTM. For selected dispatches to and from Greenslade in the GUPID system dated November and December 1941, see RG 80, PHLO "reels file," MMRB, Archives II, and author's file. See Gerhard Gesell's comments regarding deletions of Navy code systems from the official records in PHPT 4, p. 1911, and confirmation of their deletion by Commander John F. Baecher, the Navy's liaison officer for the Joint Committee on June 7, 1946 in PHLO file, RG 80, ibid., copy in author's file.
10. For McCullough's sending the intelligence data to the White House via a secure method, see Ogg's comments p. 40, SRH 255, RG 457, MMRB, Archives II.
11. Lieutenant Ellsworth Hosmer's original Navy memorandum and other papers are in the custody of his daughter, Patty Hosmer Rathbone, of Loomis, California. Mrs. Rathbone confirmed that she had custody of her father's documents in a telephone conversation with the author on April 17, 1998, notes in author's file; copies furnished to the author by Ogg, in author's files. After filing his memo, Hosmer transferred to the District's communication office on December 27, 1941. In his memo, Hosmer alludes to a dispute with Lieutenant Commander Eugene Kerrigan over locating the Japanese force north of Hawaii. Commander Kerrigan headed the investigative section of the District's intelligence office. "Kerrigan became enraged when told of the location of the force. He said I was wasting my time and instructed me to keep away," Hosmer wrote. Hosmer filed his sealed statement and papers with Lieutenant Commander Selim Woodworth, Chief Administrative Officer of the intelligence office, according to his daughter, Patty Rathbone.
12. See Robert Ogg interview, in RG 457, SRH 255, loc. cit., for: commercial radio facilities, see pp. 19, 35, 36, 38; Japanese telegraphic kana code, which is not a secret code, pp. 18, 22, 23, 25. Telephone interviews of Ogg by the author in 1999, notes, transcriptions in author's file.
13. For Ogg's quote concerning Japanese radio transmissions on 4 megacycles, see SRH 255, ibid., p. 35, "odd

- frequencies,” pp. 35, 39, 42.
14. For the radio direction finder intercept of the Akagi using the radio call sign of 8 YU NA, see Station KING, monthly report for November 1941 in RG 181, Commandant 13th Naval District, Secret A-6 files, NA, Seattle, WA, copy author’s file.
 15. For Station H report, “The Carriers are using secret calls on 4963 kcs.,” see H Chronology p. 89 of November 26, 1941 in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author’s file. The three-point gap in kilocycles is infinitesimal. The radio call sign 8 YU NA was a secret call or tactical call for the Akagi in November 1941. In communications procedures, whenever the Japanese navy placed the number before the kana it signaled a secret radio message originated by the unit. In administrative calls assigned to mobile units, the number followed the kana.
 16. See Station ITEM report in COM. 13 Secret A-6 files, RG 181, NA Seattle. Tokyo Radio addressed the vessel as FU ME 8 which was the Kirishima’s radio call sign for November 1941, according to Station CAST’s TESTM report, November 1941 in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author’s file. Vandenberg transferred from Station H to Station ITEM in June 1941 when he was relieved by Homer Kisner. Vandenberg was the Navy’s senior radio traffic chief on the West Coast.
 17. See Leslie Grogan’s reconstructed Lurline log dated December 10, 1941. The Matson Navigation Company, San Francisco furnished copy to author. Grogan reconstructed the log after the Navy seized the original on December 10, 1941. Grogan did not list or define the “lower marine frequency in the reconstructed log.” Grogan died August 4, 1974.
 18. For quote, “signals were being repeated back,” see Lurline’s reconstructed log, loc. cit.
 19. For “bold repetition,” see Lurline’s reconstructed log, loc. cit. Grogan reported hearing the blasts aimed at the North Pacific for five days. Theoretically the blasts were among at least 5,000 naval messages transmitted by Japan during the five days. But in President Jimmy Carter’s Japanese intercept release of 1979, only 102 Japanese intercepted messages from this time frame were made public. That left 4898 unreleased which surely must be considered as part of what Grogan called “blasts.” Homer Kisner, the Pacific Fleet’s traffic chief, and his operators intercepted a minimum of 1,000 Japanese radio dispatches per day.
 20. For commercial radio call signs not used for warships, see letter from Commander Fred R. Thomson to author, dated January 29, 1986, p. 1, item d., author’s file. In 1941 Thomson was radioman-in-charge of the Navy’s intercept facility, Station AE, Sitka, Territory of Alaska.
 21. For quote about “a mighty serious situation,” and presenting transcript to Lieutenant Commander Pease, see the Lurline’s reconstructed log, loc. cit..
 22. See the Lurline log withdrawal slip in RG 181, Twelfth Naval District, Port Director file, NA, San Bruno, CA.
 23. Kathleen O’Connor interview with the author, September 24, 1991, also written confirmation from Ms. O’Connor, June 16, 1999 in author’s file. See photo of her taken by author in the San Bruno National Archives research room with the suspect withdrawal slip, in author’s file.
 24. See Station ITEM intercept report of December 4, 1941, RG 181, A-6 file, NA, Laguna Niguel, CA, copy in author’s file; “Strong signals” heard by Station SAIL, see COM 13 dispatch to OPNAV serial 031825 in PHLO file, RG 80, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author’s file.
 25. For Station H confirming the ITEM report, see Operator Log of H, December 4, 1941, p. 51, as UTU 8571, NR 888 (which is the same NR heard at ITEM. The NR number refers to Japan’s naval radio station serial number), in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives, copies in author’s file.
 26. When he copied the Japanese navy’s communication procedures into his log, Henry Garstka recorded what he heard on the airways. Using the RIP 5 code typewriter he typed that HO MI 3 (Radio Yokosuka) called NU TO 4 (Hawaii radio call sign for the heavy cruiser Tone) at 10:20 A.M. and 10:45 A.M. (December 5, 1941, Tokyo Time or 2:50 P.M., and 3:15 P.M. respectively Hawaii Time, December 4, 1941. Since Japan’s navy operated on Tokyo Time, all US Navy Japanese naval intercept logs were recorded in Tokyo Time). Radio Yokosuka asked the Tone in kata kana: KAN? KAN? (“Do you have messages for me?”). See Henry F. Garstka log entry, Station H for December 5, 1941, Tokyo Time, pp. 93 and 94, RG 38, Station US papers, release of Jan. 1995, Archives II, copy author’s file (parentheses by the author). In May 1999 Garstka, then living in Edgewater Park, NJ, confirmed to the author that he worked at Station H and frequently copied Japanese comments in his log; telephone interview with author, May 1999.
 27. For example of a Japanese UTU log, see Station H Operator Logs, December 3 to 8, 1941, Tokyo Time (the only pre-Pearl Harbor logs so far released) in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, also author’s file.
 28. For Kisner’s “drastic action” quote, see Station H Chronology, p. 2, dated December 4, 1941, RG 38, Station US papers, copy in author’s file. A typeset copy of the Chronology for December 1–6, 1941, is published in PHPT 37, pp. 725 to 728. Radio traffic chief, Homer Kisner analyzed the communication data in the batch on intercepts and concluded that Japan’s navy was preparing for drastic action: “The large number of high-precedence messages and

- general distribution might indicate that the entire Navy is being instructed to be prepared for drastic action.”
29. Garstka did not record any radio response from the cruiser Tone in his Station H logbook. See Note 26 supra.
 30. For “The Carriers” remaining in vicinity of Kyushu, see Station H Chronology of December 4, 1941, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy author’s file.
 31. Homer Kisner, interviewed by the author in April 1988 (audiotape at Carlsbad, California) and April 1998 (video interview during Kisner’s visit to Sacramento, California). Transcripts of audio and video interviews, plus correspondence, notes, and telephone interviews between April 1988 and April 1998, are in author’s file.
 32. See Station H Chronology of November 20, 1941 (p. 81 loc. cit.), which associates Japanese warships of Cruiser Division Eight and Destroyer Squadron One with what Kisner called the Carrier Divisions (Kisner’s capitalization). He included different Carrier Commands and Carriers for emphasis. These warships were associated together by Station H from early November onward as they trained together in air operations, refueling at sea drills and moving to the assembly point, Hitokappu Bay during the period of November 20–24, 1941, Tokyo Time. On November 17, Kisner reported “DesRon One seems to be operating with the Carriers and that the Commander Carriers (Admiral Nagumo) was aboard the Akagi.” (See p. 79 of H Chronology.) There was one apparent error in Kisner’s analysis. He reported that the battleship Kirishima was “believed” to be at the Yokosuka Navy Base (southeast of Tokyo) on November 25, 1941, when actually the warship was at Hitokappu Bay on that date (see p. 88 of the H Chronology). See H Chronology, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author’s file.
 33. Kisner’s report on “war time basis,” see Station H Chronology, p. 2. December 6, 1941 under General, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II.
 34. For Kisner’s conclusion, “They are going to jump us,” is in a video interview with the author, April 1998, Sacramento, CA, in author’s file.
 35. For Japanese radio deception, see Captain Sadatoshi Tomioka, quoted in PHPT 1, p. 238.
 36. For Admiral T. B. Inglis’ testimony regarding Japanese radio deception, see PHPT 1, p. 185.
 37. For Edwin Layton’s description of Japanese radio deception, see his book, And I Was There (William Morrow, 1985), p. 228.
 38. See Paul Seaward’s intercept of Japanese naval air stations in Station H operator log December 6, 1941, Tokyo Time, p. 123. RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. Seaward wrote in the log: “Note Air Sta’s 9 KE KU, 1 NI KU and others working just below 8040 (kilocycles).” Seaward did not copy any messages from the air stations, according to the log. Seaward, one of the watch supervisors at Station H and an experienced intercept operator, did not suggest deception was involved, but the fact that he did not see fit to copy the messages involving the Air Stations is significant.
 39. See Fred Thomson report, Station AE, December 1941 report, p. 5, under “Radio Deception.” RG 181, NA, Seattle, copy in author’s file.
 40. See Joseph Rochefort’s Oral History, The Reminiscences of Captain Joseph J. Rochefort (US Naval Institute, Oral History Office, 1970), p. 157, copy in author’s file.

1. For Admiral Kimmel's quote, "if I had anything," see PHPT 6-2632.
2. For Rochefort's quote, "cheap price," see The Reminiscences of Captain Joseph J. Rochefort (US Naval Institute Oral History Division, 1970), p. 163.
3. For Thomas Dyer's quote, "There is not the slightest. . .," see his letter to the author, June 4, 1983, author's file. See also written statement submitted to the Joint Congressional Committee on the Pearl Harbor attack by Captain Laurance Safford, commanding officer of Station US in 1941: "The 5-Num system yielded no information which would arouse even a suspicion of the Pearl Harbor raid either before or afterward." See RG 80, PHLO, Box 49 MMRB, Archives II. Quoted by Edwin Layton in And I Was There (William Morrow, 1985), p. 548, note 27.
4. For the weather message sent to the First Air Fleet by Radio Tokyo on November 27, 1941 warning of typhoon conditions in the North Pacific, see RG 457, SRN 116668, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. Tokyo Radio said the storm's winds reached from 15 meters to 26 meters (34 m.p.h. to 58 m.p.h.) Conversion courtesy Dan Plumlee, Geography Department, University of California, Berkeley.
5. Kuroshio translates as Black Current, so-called because its waters carried the black-hulled ships of foreign nations, including those of the United States-Japan Expedition of 1854, commanded by Commodore Matthew Perry. The Perry expedition opened trade between Japan and America. Lieutenant Silas Bent, navigator for Perry, described the Kuroshio as 75 km wide with a depth of 900 meters. He said it originated in the East China Sea and formed two branches. The more powerful skirted the east coast of Japan, then turned northeast at about 40° N, 143° E. Its speed of 35-40 miles per day permitted fast sailing time. See Bent's report and his chart of the Kuro-Siwo (1857 spelling) in Francis L. Hawks, Narrative of the Expedition of an American Squadron to the China Seas and Japan (D. Appleton & Co., New York, 1857), p. 495. A black-ship festival is held at Shimoda, Japan, site of the first American trade center, according to the Tourist Industry Bureau, Ministry of Transportation, ed., Japan The Official Guide (Japan Travel Bureau, 1962), p. 367.
6. See Iki Kuromoti, written description of his journey to Pearl Harbor aboard the light cruiser HIMJS Abukuma, flagship of Destroyer Squadron One. His account is re-produced as part of the Exhibits of the Joint Congressional Committee in PHPT 13, 516 ff. A note on the translation suggests Kuromoti might be the nom de plume of an enlisted man aboard the Abukuma. Kuromoti describes the departure from Hitokappu Bay, the fierce storm that washed men overboard, etc. In the western Pacific, fierce ocean storms that are called hurricanes in the eastern Pacific are called typhoons.
7. On the Akagi's transmitter being tuned to 4960 kilocycles, see the interception of the Japanese radio call sign of 8 YU NA (November call sign of Akagi) in contact with another Japanese warship in a report by Robert Fox, radioman-in-charge at Station KING, Dutch Harbor Naval Air Station, Territory of Alaska, November 1941 monthly report, p. 3, RG 181, Commandant of Thirteenth Naval District (COM 13) A-6 report, National Archives, Seattle, WA; declassified October 9, 1985 by Donald Piff, Director of National Archives, Seattle, WA, copy in author's file. According to a general alert sent by Station SAIL to the Dutch Harbor RDF intercept station on December 3, 1941, these Japanese radio transmissions were executed in less than ten seconds in an attempt to lessen chance of discovery and interception by British and American cryptographers. See RG 181, NA, Seattle; COM 13 Secret file, Serial 202210, dated 12/3/41.

For identification of 8 YU NA as the Akagi (with a question mark), see Station H Chronology of November 28, 1941, secret call list for November 1941, p. 133, copy in author's file. Station H, the intercept facility for Station HYPO, issued a monthly report consisting of at least four sections: (1) a daily Chronology listing important Japanese naval intercepts; (2) identification of secret (sometimes referred to as tactical, meaning that the unit was involved in operations as opposed to purely administrative matters) Japanese call signs and warship addresses for naval units originating radio transmissions; (3) Code Movement reports, with radio direction finder bearings locating Japanese warships and marus; (4) individual supervisor reports from each eight hour watch. The November 1941 Station H monthly report totaled 134 numbered pages and was released to the author by the Naval Security Group Command under a FOIA request in 1985. Another crucial and separate part of the Station H records is the operator logs (HOPSLOGS) that recorded every intercepted Japanese naval transmission. About 65 intercept operators shared the work load of eight hours on, sixteen hours off, and kept a running account of the Japanese communication data in the logs. A separate log, called Message Sheets, documented the text of each message. It went on 24 hours a day without letup from July 1 to the attack of December 7, 1941. In this book, these operator logs are abbreviated as HOPSLOGS. But again beware. The Navy has released only five days of the pre-Pearl Harbor HOPSLOGS: December 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, 1941. Since the logs were kept in Tokyo Time the dates correspond in part to December 3–7, 1941, Hawaii Time. None of the HOPSLOGS prior to December 3, 1941 have been released. None of the estimated hundreds of thousands of Message Sheets that record the Japanese navy's original text have been declassified and released to the public.

The Station H records were transferred to Archives II, College Park, Maryland in 1994 as part of the Station US collection and placed in Record Group 38. A limited release of the Station H records took place in January 1995 at Archives II and those records no longer require a FOIA request. The November and December Station H Monthly Reports can be found in Box 9 of the January 1995 release. But please note: the entire Station US collection which contains the Station H records, is estimated to include over 1,000,000 documents; these are in various stages of declassification and cataloguing. The author found he could examine about 300 documents per day. An examination of the entire collection, working 365 days per year, would cover 109,500 records. At that rate, plan on at least nine years for examining the entire collection.

For further identification of 8 YU NA as the Akagi, see two TESTM reports of Station CAST, November 14, 1941, secret serial 141522, and November 27, 1941, secret serial 281511, in RG 38, Station US papers, TESTM file, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. See also Station H report of hearing carriers transmitting on 4963 kilocycles on November 26, 1941 in HMORPT, p. 89; see Station HYPO Communication Summary (COMSUM) of November 30, 1941 which reports hearing the Akagi on tactical radio circuits in contact with several marus, in RG 80, PHLO, Box 41, MMRB, Archives II. See Edwin Layton's contrary view (without confirming details) that the Akagi was misidentified, in his biography And I Was There (William Morrow, 1985), p. 227. Homer Kisner's placement of the HIMJS Hiryu relied on radio direction finder bearings submitted by Station CAST. Kisner placed the carrier HIMJS Hiryu in Japan's Inland Sea near the city of Kure on November 29, 1941. Kisner apparently based his estimate on CAST's RDF bearing taken on November 26 (Hawaii Time) when the Hiryu was about a day out of Hitokappu Bay. CAST did not place the carrier at Kure, but reported the bearing as 30 degrees from Corregidor—a northern bearing line that takes in the offshore waters of Hitokappu Bay (see the Great Circle Chart on p. 191 of this book. Technically the great circle bearing of 30 degrees could also be southward from Corregidor—through the South China Sea and Indian Ocean—an illogical location for the carrier). For the Hiryu bearing by CAST, see the TESTM report, secret serial 281511, in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.

There were 31 warships in the First Air Fleet proceeding through the North Pacific, plus two more in the Central Pacific known as the Midway Neutralization Unit (sometimes translated as the Midway Destruction Unit) according to figures prepared by Rear Admiral Sadatoshi Tomioka, Operations Chief, Navy General Staff, cited in Gordon Prange, At Dawn We Slept (McGraw Hill, 1981), p. 416.

8. Solar storms affecting radio/telegraph and voice transmissions in the winter of 1941–42 were predicted several months in advance in 1941, in bulletins issued by the United States Department of Commerce, National Bureau of Standards (NBS) entitled Radio Transmission Handbook (NBSHB). Each bulletin (and addendum), updating solar storm conditions as predicted by the NBS, was forwarded to all naval commandants and Navy radio facilities, including the intercept stations. See the Radio Transmission Handbook, Frequencies 1000 to 30,000 KC (prepared by the National Bureau of Standards, Washington, DC, under the sponsorship of the Communications Section National Defense Research Committee). Selected NBS comments taken from the Handbook by the author follow: the range of the radio waves is accelerated over ocean waters because of the greater electrical conductivity of the ocean (p. 15); ionosphere storms are most severe in northern latitudes and decrease in intensity toward the equator (p. 13). High frequency radio waves—above 2000 kcs—are given a boost by the storms (p. 9). Ionosphere is the region 30 to 300 miles above the earth's surface that reflects radio waves (p. 5). See the looseleaf Handbook, in RG 181, Box 196506, NA, Laguna Niguel, CA, copy in author's file. The solar storm over the weekend of Nov. 28–Dec. 1, 1941 reached “disaster” proportions on December 1, when the NBS rated the storm at 8 on a scale of 0 to 9. See NSB report in RG 181, COM 14 files, San Bruno, CA for Dec. 1941 to Feb. 1942, copy in author's file. For use of frequencies in the 4960–4980 kilocycle range to overcome radio interference by solar storms (a.k.a., the Dellinger effect), see SRH-355, pp. 273–275, RG 457, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. Solar storm interference varies throughout the northern latitudes, and by time of year, daylight versus night; radio transmission bounce can last from minutes to hours.
9. In naval parlance, “type command” refers to vessels of all same military purposes: battleships are a type; ditto cruisers, carriers, etc. See two Homer Kisner interviews with author April 1988 in Carlsbad, California (audio tape, still photographs, transcript and follow up correspondence), and in April 1999 in Sacramento, California (video tape, still photographs, transcript). Both interview sessions were augmented by telephone conversations and correspondence during a ten year span from 1988 to 1998; transcripts and correspondence are in author's file.
10. For identification of the Kyokuto Maru and its close radio association with the Commander Carriers, see

- Communication Summary of October 9, 1941 in RG 80, PHLO, Box 41, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
11. For the Kyokuto's code movement reports obtained by Station H in November 1941, see November 1941, Chronology of Station H, pp. 96, 99, 100, and identification of its secret radio call sign of 4 U I, see p. 128 in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II; also in author's file.
 12. The commanding officer of the Kyokuto Maru placed aboard the aircraft carrier HIMJS Kaga, see Communication Summary for October 27, 1941, loc. cit. For Admiral Kimmel examining COMSUMS each morning at 8:15 A.M., see Layton testimony at PHPT 10 p. 4833. The Kaga served as the temporary flagship of Admiral Nagumo while the Akagi was refitting at the Yokosuka naval base.
 13. For Kimmel's question to his intelligence chief Edwin Layton, "Where are the carriers?" see PHPT 36, p. 128. See Layton's book And I Was There (William Morrow, 1985), p. 243. Layton's Akagi intercept testimony to the Congressional investigation on February 18, 1946: "The fact that Akagi was that day (November 30, 1941) exercising with several marus was brought to my attention and the admiral noted it also. He asked me what I thought, as I recall it, and I said the Akagi was probably talking to some tanker marus, marus being merchant ships and probably going to get oil." PHPT 10, p. 4836. Layton then testified, "Since the middle of November the association of forces, the tying together of your task forces, the commander of carriers, or carrier division commander, with the exception of Carrier Division 3, were not addressed, were not associated, and apparently were entirely aloof from the whole proceeding," PHPT 10, p. 4837. Layton repeated that neither the carriers, the carrier division commanders, or the carrier commander in chief were ever addressed, "not even once," PHPT 10, p. 4839. Layton on the disappearance of the carriers: "My own personal opinion was that the carriers were remaining in home waters preparing for operations so that they would be in a covering position in case we moved against Japan," PHPT 10, p. 4840.
 14. For an additional statement by Edwin Layton that the Japanese carriers had neither been sent nor originated radio messages since mid-November 1941, see his book And I Was There, p. 243: "There was no traffic—or traffic analysis—to or from these carriers or their commanders."
 15. For Joseph Rochefort's testimony that he didn't lose the carriers but found them in a negative sense, see exchange with Congressman John Murphy (D., PA) on February 15, 1946 during the Joint Congressional Investigation, found at PHPT 10, p. 4681. But see his answer to a follow-up question posed by Murphy: "Is it the usual plan, when you have a war warning and you cannot account for carriers, that you prepare for the worst?" Rochefort: "Yes, sir." PHPT 10, p. 4682.
 16. See a letter from Richard A. von Doenhoff to the author NNRM93–RVD, July 9, 1993, in author's file. For the original Communications Summaries (COMSUMS) prepared by Station HYPO in 1941 that were read and initialed by Admiral Kimmel, see RG 80, PHLO, Box 41 (includes the mutilated copies), Archives II, duplicate copy in author's file.
 17. See Stephen E. Ambrose, Pearl Harbor Revisited (St. Martin's Press, 1995), pp. 99–100. Ambrose repeated this charge in a Wall Street Journal opinion piece on May 27, 1999: "The real problem was that American intelligence was terrible (sound familiar?)" (Parentheses by Ambrose.) Homer Kisner told the author that Stephen Ambrose never contacted him for comment on the Navy's 1941 communications intelligence operations.
 18. Duane Whitlock interviewed by the author in Danville, California, September 1993, audio tape, transcript, notes, in author's file. Follow up telephone calls, notes and correspondence and e-mail in May and June 1999 with Whitlock at Strawberry Point, Iowa, author's file. Author's interview of Homer Kisner, April 1988 (audiotape transcript, still photographs, notes), in author's file. A second interview with Kisner while he was on a family automotive tour, video taped at Sacramento, California, April 1998 (still photographs, notes, and video tape transcript), in author's file.

With the guidance of Captain Homer Kisner, the 1941 radio traffic chief for the Pacific Fleet, and Captain Duane Whitlock, traffic analyst for Station CAST, the author located evidence of the carriers and commands originating and receiving radio messages between November 15 and December 6, 1941. Both Navy captains have impeccable professional reputations. Both were cited for their intercept and cryptographic skills between July 1941 and June 1942 and placed on the Midway Cryptographic Honor Roll by Admiral Chester Nimitz. In 1941–42, both were chief radiomen and later advanced to commissioned officers. As of this writing, both are retired; Kisner lives in California, Whitlock in Iowa. For over fifty years, both these giants in American naval cryptography have been ignored by Congress and every Pearl Harbor investigation, excluded by historians, and the media. Yet they were in on all of the major intelligence events of the Pacific War.

19. See the TESTM reports originated by Station CAST in November and December 1941 and received at Station HYPO initialed by Lieutenant Commander Thomas Huckins and Radioman Rodney Whitten of Station HYPO, in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
20. For the documentation of the 129 Japanese naval intercepts involving the carriers and warships of the First Air Fleet between November 15 and December 6, 1941, see the author's compilation based on intercepts found in RG 457 in the SRN intercept series; the TESTM reports of Station CAST; and Station H code movement reports in RG 38, MMRB, Archives II, compilation in author's file. The Station CAST TESTM radio direction finder reports involving the carriers were discussed with Captain Duane Whitlock, at Danville, California, in September 1993; notes, transcript, photographs, audiotape interview in author's file. Intercepts, code movement reports were discussed with Captain Homer Kisner, at Carlsbad, California, in April 1988 (notes, taped audio interview, transcript, and photographs in author's file), and at Sacramento in April 1998; notes, video tape, transcript and photographs, in author's file).

The author arranged the 129 intercepts into seven categories and labeled them from A to G for the purpose of analyzing them for this book: (A) Vice Admiral Chuichi Nagumo, commander-in-chief of the First Air Fleet, originated 60 transmissions in his Secret Message Series (SMS) between November 15 and December 7, 1941 (Hawaii Time); see special booklet prepared by the author and labeled "SMS series, Vol. 1," in author's file. It is a compilation of Nagumo's SMS messages based on the SRN series in RG 38 and 457, Archives II, also in author's file; (B) for the 24 messages dispatched to various First Air Fleet vessels, see RG 38 and 457, loc. cit.; (C) for the 20 transmissions originated by six carriers, see RG 38 and 457, loc. cit.; (D) for the twelve messages originated by the Carrier Division Commanders, see RG 38 and 457, loc. cit.; (E) eight warships attached to the First Air Fleet (not carriers) originated 12 messages, see RG 38 and 457, loc. cit.; (F) the Midway Neutralization Unit (HIMJS Shiriyu and two destroyers) originated four messages, RG 38 and 457, loc. cit.; and finally (G) there was one message addressed to Carrier Division Four. Entire compilation based on Station US papers, RG 38, 457, Station H code movement reports, Station CAST TESTM files, Archives II, copies in author's file.

21. See article by Koichi Shimada in The Japanese Navy in World War II, Raymond O'Connor, ed., (US Naval Institute Press, 1969), p. 34. The correct title of the command was Imperial Navy General Headquarters. According to Joseph Rochefort's cryptographers at Station HYPO, Admiral Nagano held two titles, Chief of the Navy General Staff (NGS) and Chief of the Imperial Navy General Headquarters (IHQ). When Nagano convened his staff on the palace grounds it became IHQ; at the naval ministry, NGS. According to Station H records, Nagano used different radio call signs to distinguish the commands; see RG 457, SRN series, and RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copies in author's file. There were six messages transmitted to Japanese naval communications officers in the Formosa/South China area by Radio Tokyo on December 4, 1941 (Tokyo Time), according to Station H records. Three were addressed to units of the Eleventh Air Fleet (AF); two are unidentified as this book goes to press; one was addressed to the China Fleet. See Station H operator log (HOPSLOG), December 4, 1941 (Tokyo Time) for radio call signs: HA O 249 (UNID), KI NE 549 (AF), RE HE 849 (AF), SA HA 049 (UNID), SI HA 149 (AF), TA KE 649 (China), in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, author's file. The suffix 49 designated radio officers.
22. For identifications of the radio call signs of the Eleventh Air Fleet immediately prior to the attack, see TESTM dispatch with secret serial 051533 of December 4, 1941 (Tokyo Time) found in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. The initials RW that appear on the dispatch belong to Rodney Whitten of Rochefort's staff, which confirms that it was received at HYPO.
23. For CU's intercept record of SI HA 149, see the HOPSLOG of December 4, 1941 (Tokyo Time), p. 51, as UTU 8591. CU made the intercept at 3:15 A.M. (or 7:45 A.M., December 3, 1941, Hawaii Time) on 8310 kilocycles.
24. Of Japan's Hawaii force of about 30 fleet submarines (I-boats), eleven were equipped with small float planes. A hangar, catapult, and a service crane for lifting the plane (called an E-14Y by Japan, and Glen by the US Navy) out of the water were installed on the broad afterdeck of each sub. After a flight, the wings of the Glen were dismantled and, along with the fuselage, stored inside the compact hangar. A Glen from the sub I-25 bombed the Oregon coast near Brookings in September 1942—the only air bombing of the US mainland in World War II. See Dorr Carpenter and Norman Polmar, Submarines of the Imperial Japanese Navy (Naval Institute Press, 1986), pp. 5, 6, 7, and 13.
25. For Joseph Rochefort's testimony that he "never received RDF from Samoa," see the Army Pearl Harbor Proceedings, PHPT 28, p. 868. See SECRET file of Lieut. Cmdr. Thomas Huckins, Confidential Serial ADCO14/12-10, p. 3, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. For the 300 pages of RDF bearings taken by Station VICTOR between July and December 1941, see the index of Station US papers, folder 3270/5, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II; see the Station VICTOR document tracing RDF to Rochefort in RG 181, file A-6, Samoa, found in NA, San Bruno, CA, copies in author's file.
26. For the PSIS report, see file 500-1, Japanese Submarine Operations, Vol. 1, p. 2, RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II. For the intercept report (but not its text) of Admiral Shimizu by Stanley Gramblin, see the Station H operator log for December 4, 1941, Tokyo Time, p. 52; RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
27. Vice Admiral Shigeyoshi Inoue used his radio call sign RI RO ØØ, according to the log entries of Henry Garstka and LF. See operator logs, Station H, pp. 100 (Garstka), 120 (LF), December 6, 1941 Tokyo Time; RG 38, MMRB,

- Archives II, copy in author's file. For the English message text of Admiral Inoue's declaration-of-war message, with omissions, see RG 457, SRN 115368, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
28. For the repeat of Admiral Inoue's war declaration intercept by LF, see Station H operator log, December 6, 1941, p. 120, as RI RO ØØ, NR 951 (Garstka's intercept was NR 952) on 6665 kilocycles at 6:48 P.M. Tokyo Time or 11:18 P.M. December 5, 1941 in Hawaii; see Station US papers, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. The letters NR apparently refer to accounting numbers of Japan's dispatching radio station.
 29. For Rear Admiral Ugaki's premature release of the Imperial Rescript, see the Station H operator log of December 6, 1941 at 11:20 P.M. (Tokyo Time), which is 3:40 A.M. Saturday, December 6 in Hawaii. Station H intercept operator Maynard Albertson (sine SU) recorded Ugaki's message as number 92. Then 55 minutes later, at 12:15 A.M. (on December 7, Tokyo Time, or 4:45 A.M., on December 6, Hawaii Time), Albertson intercepted Admiral Yamamoto's version as number 93. For the intercept details of Emperor Hirohito's Imperial Rescript, jointly issued with Admiral Yamamoto and received in Hawaii during the early dawn hours of December 6, 1941 (Hawaii Time), see Station US papers, Station H operator log, pp. 101 for Ugaki's number 92, and 124 for Admiral Yamamoto's version, in RG 38, Archives II, copy in author's file. Ugaki used his radio call sign of SE TU 758; Yamamoto used YO WI ØØ which is the same call sign he used for the Climb Mount Niitaka dispatch on December 2. For the English version of the Imperial Transcript intercepted by Albertson, see RG 457, SRN series, SRN 115370 (Rescript), 115371 (Yamamoto's introduction), MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. The Emperor also issued separate Rescripts to the Japanese army and navy ministers and to the citizens of Japan. Transmission details have not been disclosed as this book goes to press.
 30. Emperor Hirohito's Imperial Rescript was received aboard the cruiser HIMJS Aoba on December 7, 1941 (Tokyo Time). See JICPOA item 4986, pp. 3, 15, RG 181, National Archives, San Bruno, CA, copy in author's file.
 31. For the the misleading English language version of the Hirohito/Yamamoto Rescript message, see SRN 115371 in RG 457, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. A notation on SRN 115371 claims that the intercept is available only in captured form and is dated December 7, 1941, implying that the Japanese transmission took place after the attack. The transmission date listed is actually Tokyo Time. The censorship has skewed historians' accounts of Emperor Hirohito's message. According to historian Robert J. C. Butow, the Emperor's "annihilate the enemy" rescript was not issued until more than eight hours after the Pearl Harbor attack. See Robert J. C. Butow, Tojo and the Coming of the War (Stanford University Press, 1961), p. 408 n. 5. Of the approximately 1,000 intercepts collected by operators of Station H during the period 8:00 A.M. December 5 to 8:00 A.M. December 6, 1941 (Hawaii Standard Time), only six have been declassified by the National Security Agency (NSA). Since Jesse Randle's intercepts did not enter the pipeline until the morning of December 7, they are not included in this discussion.
 32. On carriers operating with Japanese Cruiser Division Eight and Destroyer Squadron One, see Station H Chronology for November 20, 1941, p. 81, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
 33. For Kisner quote, "the only time I forecast war," see transcript of Kisner's video interview by the author, Sacramento, CA, on April 24, 1998, in author's file.
 34. For quote by Thomas Dyer, "no warm bodies," see Dyer's letter to the author, June 4, 1983, in author's file.
 35. Confirmation of the decoding and translation of complete Japanese warship movement reports is murky. Captain Al Pelletier, a Station US cryptologist in 1941, wrote that 90 percent of the text of the Japanese navy's ship movement code could be read in Washington prior to December 7, 1941; see Cryptolog, Summer 1992, p. 5. Hawaii's Navy cryptographers could also decrypt the code, according to Joseph Rochefort, commander of Station HYPO. Rochefort testified to the Congressional Investigating Committee on February 15, 1946 that his staff could handle and translate the ship movements. See his testimony in PHPT 10, p. 4678. If so, a question still lingers: why didn't Pelletier at Station US and Rochefort at HYPO decrypt and translate the Shiriyu's message for Admiral Kimmel? The Pacific Fleet and the sailors of Battleship Row needed to know. There has never been an answer to the Navy's failure to divulge the Shiriyu's intercept. The intercept was never introduced before any Pearl Harbor investigation so none of the investigators could get answers. Homer Kisner did not recall the Shiriyu report, but did remember obtaining position reports of Japanese war ships between Hawaii and the Empire, and concluded that Japan was "going to jump us"; video interview of Kisner by the author, April 24, 1998, Sacramento, CA, transcript, videotape, still photographs, notes, and correspondence, in author's file. Shiriyu filed eight code movement reports in November that appear to have been decrypted at Station H. See Monthly Report of Station H, November 1941, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. Captain Minoru Togo of the Shiriyu was the son of Admiral Heihachiro Togo, Japan's famed hero and the victor of the Russian fleet battle, May 1905.
 36. On Vice Admiral William Halsey's search in the area of Wake Island, see the Deck Log of the USS Enterprise, Halsey's flagship, for December 1 to 7, 1941, RG 24, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. Flight operation schedules show that Halsey conducted daily morning and evening reconnaissance flights.
 37. See the radio frequency charts issued by the US Department of Commerce, National Bureau of Standards, November

- 1941 to February 1942. The Bureau of Standards radio section suggested using radio frequencies that were capable of reaching radio receivers operating in the open ocean waters of the North Pacific at various hours of the day and night during that time frame. By coincidence, the National Bureau of Standards used the 40° N for the North Pacific open ocean communication baseline—the approximate west to east route used by Japan’s First Air Fleet on its Hawaiian journey. Included among the recommended frequencies were those that ranged from 11,000 to 16,000 kilocycles. A first day communications intelligence student, aware that Radio Tokyo and Radio Ominato were transmitting to warships using the 11,000 to 16,000 kilocycle range, could consult the Bureau’s charts and could approximate—if not pinpoint—the position of the vessels. The frequency charts were seasonal and published by the Bureau throughout 1941; they took into account the solar storm activity that disrupted radio communications in the Northern Hemisphere. For the November 1941 to February 1942 charts, see RG 181, Eleventh Naval District, A-6 radio files, Box 196506, National Archives, Laguna Niguel, California, copy in author’s file. Operators at Station H who heard Tokyo calling the tankers (but no replies were heard) were Roy Lehman, William Eaton, and Charles Southerland. See the Station H Log Book, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author’s file.
38. For reaction to the so-called United States ultimatum of November 26, 1941, see The Reminiscences of Joseph Rochefort, p. 66 ff. See also the comment on the ultimatum by Ensign Kazuo Sakamaki, the Japanese midget sub commander captured as Prisoner of War Number 1 when his sub ran aground on Oahu on December 7: “Your honorable ‘have’ country placed an economic blockade on the ‘have not’ country.” PHLO, RG 80, MMRB, Archives II. On Cordell Hull’s modus vivendi, see PHPT 14, p. 1157. FDR’s handwritten note is in the same location at p. 1142.
 39. For Secretary of State Hull’s modus vivendi, see PHPT 14, p. 1150; see also discussion on the modus vivendi in Harry Elmer Barnes, Perpetual War for Perpetual Peace (Caxton Printers, 1953), p. 344, ff.
 40. For copy of FDR’s handwritten note to Hull, see PHPT 14, p. 1142.
 41. Since the Climb Mount Niitaka message was sent to some Japanese naval commands that lacked cryptographic expertise, Admiral Yamamoto couldn’t take a chance on encrypting the message in the complicated Code Book D (5–Num). Smaller commands—picket boats, coastal lookouts, and other smaller units needed to get the word, but didn’t have the sophistication or the trained cryptologists to decipher Code Book D (the 5–Num code). They would have been out in the cold, unable to decipher the D-code messages. So apparently, according to some Japanese historians and Edwin Layton, the intelligence chief for the Pacific Fleet, Admiral Yamamoto decided to use Code Book A—the hidden-word code. From the A code book, he chose “Niitaka Yama Nobore 1208”: “Climb Mt. Niitaka December 8.” Japan’s foreign ministry, army, and navy each had a special hidden word code for the war’s start. “East Wind Rain,” served the foreign ministry; “The black kite, eagle, and hawk will fly December 8” was the code for the Imperial Army. See the Niitaka dispatch reproduced on p. 221 of this book.
 42. Joseph Christie Howard arrived in Hawaii from Station US on March 6, 1941. He had acquired the latest skills on Japanese naval radio communications and code procedures from his Washington, DC instructor Anton Novak, one of the US Navy’s brightest code breakers. Novak is on the Midway Cryptographic Honor Roll. The author’s twelve-year search for Joseph C. Howard in the naval records was difficult. He was carried on the official Navy roster of Station H as James C. Howard. Finally in May 1999 the author located him, living happily with his wife in Kent, Washington. Howard apologized for the name mix up but said it wasn’t his fault; it was the Navy’s. “And they had the guts to ask me for six thousand dollars to change the wording on a plaque at the Naval Security Group Command Headquarters from the misnamed James to Joseph,” Howard said in a telephone interview with the author.
 43. Edwin Layton provided four versions concerning the transmission (or lack thereof) of the Niitaka message to the 1945–46 Joint Congressional Committee investigating Pearl Harbor. He began by stating: (1) “I am being honest with you. The message was never transmitted by the Japanese” (to Senator Ferguson [R., MI], on the evening of Feb. 18, 1946. PHPT 10, p. 4906); then he said, “The message was broadcast in plain language” (to Rep. Murphy [D., PA], PHPT 10, p. 4908); then, “Message never heard or intercepted in Hawaii” (to Rep. Murphy PHPT 10, 4909); and then “We did not have the message in Hawaii” (to Rep. Murphy, PHPT 10, 4908). A fifth version appeared in his book: “[The message] was intercepted at Station SAIL and thus not available in Hawaii” (Edwin Layton, And I Was There, p. 242). His sixth version emerged at his Carmel, California home, November 29, 1982, when the author interviewed him for this book. The interview went well until the author asked him about these inconsistencies and his failure to pass the Niitaka dispatch to his boss, Admiral Kimmel. Layton became visibly angry, quickly rose from his chair, and indicated that the interview was over.
 44. Author’s telephone interviews, correspondence, and notes with Joseph Christie Howard, Kent, Washington, June 1999, in author’s file. Howard said his sine XT which appears on all his 1941 Navy intercepts, was adopted from his grandfather’s shorthand; the latter abbreviated Christie as XT (similar to Xmas).
 45. See: Hiroyuki Agawa, The Reluctant Admiral (Naval Institute Press, 1979), p. 244. The Niitaka message was drafted aboard Admiral Yamamoto’s flagship, HIMJS Nagato, on December 2, 1941, and released for radio transmission at 1500 (3:00 P.M. Tokyo Time) by his chief of staff, Rear Admiral Matome Ugaki. Yamamoto had been called to Tokyo to receive an Imperial Rescript from Emperor Hirohito. The message was transmitted by the Tokyo Navy Signals Unit, whose call letters were HA FU 6. By not using the Nagato's transmitter, Japan hoped to conceal Yamamoto's identity as the originator of the message. The ruse did not work. His most secret radio call sign, YO WI ØØ, was heard and identified at Stations CAST and H on December 2 and 6. Transmission of the message to the entire Japanese Navy took most of the night hours; see Kanya Miyauchi Niitaka Yama Nobore 1208 (Tokyo: Rikkyou Shuppan, 1976), p. 19. In his four-volume history of the Pacific War, Takushiro Hattori says the Niitaka dispatch was sent in "clear text." See Takushiro Hattori, Dai-Toa Senso Zenshi (Complete History of the Greater East Asia War), 4 vols, (Tokyo: Masu Shobo, 1953), pp. 345–349 and 362. On December 2, Tokyo Time, the Imperial Japanese Army also notified its commands of the war's start using the agreed-language (hidden-meaning) code: "The black kite, eagle, and hawk will fly December 8"; see Hattori, loc. cit., pp. 348, 349. Translations for this book were made by Sean and Naemi McPherson, Japanese language translators, University of California at Berkeley.

46. In his correspondence and telephone interview with the author, Howard confirmed that he worked the midnight to eight A.M. watch on Tuesday, December 2, 1941. At the conclusion of the shift he turned over his intercepts to the watch supervisor, Elliott Okins. That was the last he saw of the intercepts until 58 years later, in June 1999 when the author asked him to authenticate the English version of his famed intercept as found in Archives II. Howard instantly recognized his sine that he had copied from his grandfather, but could not recall whether the original message was in plain Japanese or the 5–Num code. "It's been too long. I do recall copying a few Japanese plain language messages in the weeks before Pearl Harbor but I can't confirm this Niitaka message was among them." Howard agreed that the message was probably the most historic of World War II, for it catapulted the United States into what had been called a European war. Congress declared war on Japan, December 8, followed with declarations against Germany and Italy on December 11, 1941. Throughout the globe, it was World War II. Howard said the mystery of whether Admiral Yamamoto's start-the-war order was in plain language or in 5–Num code could easily be solved by examining the message sheet on which he typed the original text. He recalled he had worked two of the Underwood code typewriters, called RIP 5's. "One was for my operator log; the other, for the message text, was on a stand with casters that I could roll about for convenience." Telephone interviews of Joseph C. Howard by the author, June 1999, notes in author's file.
47. See author's FOIA requests directed to Admirals Studemann, McConnell, and Stevens as well as FOIAs to National Security Agency and National Archives, in author's file.
48. See author's interviews with Homer Kisner, April 1988 and April 1998, transcript, notes, audio tapes in author's file.
49. See RK's comments in SRN 115376, RG 457, Archives II. Beware of the blacked out version. Item Time, written on the intercept that is reproduced in this book on p. 221 by RK, refers to Japan Time. The ninth letter of the alphabet refers to nine hours subtracted from Greenwich Mean Time, England, hence the minus-nine time. Mount Niitaka is on Formosa; its 13,075-foot peak is 500 feet higher than Mount Fuji in Japan.
50. In telephone interviews with the author on June 15 and 28, 1999, Howard estimated it took less than five minutes to record Admiral Yamamoto's war start order directed at the United States and her allies in his log book and on the message sheet. He said that if the message was in plain language it was called Romanji by the operators at Station H. "We did not refer to the letters as kana in 1941," Howard said. Station CAST obtained a radio direction finder bearing on a Yamamoto radio call sign of YO WI ØØ on December 2. The identical call sign appears on the Niitaka message intercepted at Station H and provides circumstantial evidence that the message was available to MacArthur and Hart in Manila, see TESTM file, Station US papers, Archives II, copy in author's file. According to the Station H operator logs, Admiral Yamamoto only used the call sign, YO WI ØØ, twice during the week of December 1 to 6; once for the Niitaka message on December 2, the other for a message on December 6. Obviously Station CAST identified Yamamoto's call sign of YO WI ØØ from the Niitaka message; this indicates that it was intercepted on Corregidor by one of the operators on duty.

A major historical question is then raised: Did General MacArthur and Admiral Hart receive copies of Niitaka? (For MacArthur's access to intercepts obtained by Station CAST, see Note 50 below.) Captain Duane Whitlock who was one of three radio traffic analysts at CAST in December 1941, agreed that if the message was in plain Japanese he or the other analysts/cryptographers would have instantly recognized its impact and would have sounded the alarm, but he could not recall the Niitaka message during telephone interviews with the author in May and June 1999, notes in author's file.

Whitlock, a radioman first class in 1941, had no recollection of seeing Admiral Yamamoto's start-the-war order. Later, Whitlock, then stationed in Melbourne, Australia, was part of the American cryptographic team that in 1943 intercepted and decoded an air-flight itinerary for Admiral Yamamoto and directed US Army Air Force fighters to its path in the Solomon Islands. There the admiral's twin-engine bomber was shot down; Yamamoto died in the crash.

51. See Elliott Okins' report in Station H monthly report under date of December 2, 1941, in RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
52. See Communications Summary for December 2, 1941, p. 2, RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
53. On March 25, 1941, Station CAST was directed to coordinate its intercept activities involving the Japanese army, navy, and diplomatic code systems with General MacArthur's intercept unit, Station SIX on Corregidor. In turn, MacArthur was ordered to use rapid means to furnish copies of all Japanese diplomatic intercepts to Station CAST, whose translators would furnish English translations directly to him. The order by Army Chief of Staff General George Marshall was: "Deliver exact translation of this message to MacArthur." See: OPNAV, released by Admiral Ingersoll, and dispatched in the Navy's GATOF code system as SECRET serial 251500, March 25, 1941, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
54. On the conversion of the Del Monte airfields on Mindanao Island to landing strips for B-17 bombers, see the files of the MacArthur Memorial, MacArthur Square, operated by the City of Norfolk, Virginia.
55. On McMorris's "Never" comment, see PHPT 22, p. 526. For McMorris's action plan, see RG 80, PHLO file, MMRB, Archives II, and PHPT 33, p.1348.

1. See Cecil Brown, Suez to Singapore (Halcyon House, 1943), p. 284. Kimmel wrote that he obtained news from “the radio and newspapers,” see Husband E. Kimmel, Admiral Kimmel’s Story, Henry Regnery Company, 1955), p. 94. See also Admiral Kimmel’s testimony to the 1944 Navy Court of Inquiry: “I got a major part of my diplomatic information from the newspapers,” PHPT 32, p. 237.
2. For contrasting Admiral Kimmel’s statements concerning the lack of long range air search plans and the so-called unavailability of scouting aircraft on the morning of December 7, 1941, see the actual status of the long-range planes that were available to him at Pearl Harbor that morning in PHPT 24, p. 1367. He discusses Hawaiian long range search activities in his book Admiral Kimmel’s Story, pp. 14 ff. and 65 ff., but does not explain grounding the 54 planes that were available for long-range reconnaissance on December 7, 1941. Critics have blasted Kimmel for what they see as his perceived failure to place reconnaissance aircraft in the air. But he had an ideal defense to the charge: His orders from Washington were explicit: Stand aside and permit Japan to commit the first overt act of war. See Admiral Kimmel’s Story, p. 15 where he intimates that he expected Japan’s air attack would come from the North Pacific: “The type of air attack the Japs actually made was considered the most probable form such an attack would take.”
3. Unlike Japanese military messages which were hidden from Congress, the two Foreign Office messages indicating war with America and Britain on pp. 225–26 were introduced before the Joint Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbor Attack (JOINT) in 1945–46.
4. General Marshall’s December 7 message was dispatched by Western Union landlines in the United States from Washington to Oakland, California, then by RCA wireless facilities on the headlands of Marin County, north of San Francisco, to Honolulu. It reached RCA’s South King Street office in Honolulu at 7:33 A.M. An attendant telephoned to Short’s headquarters asking for delivery instructions. No one answered the phone, so the message was dispatched by motorcycle messenger to Fort Shafter. The messenger arrived at the US Army’s Fort Shafter at 11:45 A.M. Decoding delays ensued and the message was not delivered directly to General Short until 2:58 P.M. He then sent a copy to Admiral Kimmel, who threw it in a wastebasket: “It is not of the slightest interest to me now.” For delivery time to Fort Shafter in Honolulu, see PHPT 9, p. 4404; see also General Walter Short’s papers, Hoover Institution Archives, Stanford University, Stanford, CA.
5. Foreign Minister Shigenori Togo’s memo was dated Tokyo Time. See PHPT 12, p. 238.
6. The “thirteen-part” message was actually one message, broken into thirteen parts by the wireless firms for transmissions purposes; see the thirteen-part message 902 in PHPT 12, pp. 239–245. In 1941, wireless messages were divided into groups of fifty words (or code groups) for ease of transmission, then dispatched over the airwaves. Apparently the thirteen-part message contains 650 words or encoded groups of five letters each. In their testimony given to the 1945–46 Joint Congressional Investigation into Pearl Harbor, neither Kramer nor Schulz fully described the items contained in their presidential deliveries, nor did they clarify whether or not there were military intercepts in the pouch. In 1941 the naval aide’s office was located in the mail room of what is now the Old Executive Office Building, adjacent to the west wing of the White House.
7. See PHPT 12, pp. 239 ff., for a complete English translation of the fourteen-part message. For Francis M. Brotherhood’s testimony on intercepts 380 and 381, see PHPT 33, pp. 843 ff. See also Station SAIL December 1941 report, p. 2, RG 187, A-6 secret file, National Archives, Seattle, copy in author’s file.
8. For Lester Schulz’ testimony to the Joint Congressional Investigating Committee in 1946, see PHPT 10, p. 4663.
9. During the Congressional hearings in 1946, Senator Homer Ferguson praised Lieut. Cmdr. Kramer: “At least we had someone running that night,” see PHPT 9, p. 4043.
10. For the English text of message 381 (Part 14), see PHPT 12, p. 245.
11. See John Beardall, PHPT 11, pp. 5287 ff. Chief White House Usher Howell Crim did not record the Saturday night visit of Lester Schulz. Instead the White House Usher Book records the Roosevelts as hosting a dinner for 34 persons, highlighted by a violin concert by Arthur LeBlanc, which ended at 10:55 P.M. The December 7 Usher Book does not record Beardall’s 10:00 A.M. arrival/delivery. The record begins at 12:30 P.M. listing a visit by the Chinese Ambassador. FDR and Harry Hopkins were served lunch in the Oval Study at 1:15 P.M. which was 7:45 A.M. in Hawaii. The first bomb drops were ten minutes away. White House Usher Books, FDRL, copy in author’s file.
12. Admiral Stark’s version of the midnight telephone call is suspect. During his initial testimony to the Congressional investigation, he denied having a telephone conversation with the President Saturday night: “To the best of my - knowledge and belief, the President did not call me that night,” PHPT 11, p. 5157. But when his flag secretary contradicted Stark’s account, the admiral admitted his telephone conversation with Roosevelt. Throughout his Congressional Pearl Harbor testimony Stark was evasive and defensive on 343 occasions using such phrases as “I do not know” and “I’m not clear, I’m hazy.” He invoked “I can’t recall” 160 times. The author’s compilations are based on Stark’s testimony before the Joint Congressional Investigating committee on December 31, 1945 and January 2, 3, 4, and 5, 1946, in PHPT 5, p. 2096; April 9, and 11, 1946, PHPT 11, p. 5153. For President Roosevelt’s reported quote, “Relations with Japan are very critical,” see PHPT 11, pp. 5543, 5546, 5557.

13. See testimony of Colonel Rufus Bratton to the Joint Congressional Investigating Committee, February 1946 PHPT 10, p. 4615 ff.
 14. For the Army Pearl Harbor Board’s conclusion regarding General Marshall, see PHPT 3, p. 1469.
 15. See the sworn affidavit of General Walter Bedell Smith dated June 15, 1945 at Frankfurt am Main, and included as part of the Clausen Pearl Harbor Investigation, in PHPT 35, p. 90.
 16. For the Keefe-Murphy quarrel of December 13, 1945, see PHPT 3, p. 1560.
 17. For the Army Pearl Harbor Board testimony of Pvt. George Elliott, see PHPT 27, pp. 517 ff., for Pvt. Joseph Lockard, see loc. cit., p. 526 ff.
 18. For the testimony of Pvt. Joseph McDonald, see PHPT 29, pp. 2121 ff.
 19. For Lieutenant Kermit A. Tyler’s testimony on hearing Hawaiian music over a local radio station about 4:00 A.M. on Sunday December 7, 1941, see his testimony to the Navy Court of Inquiry, August 17, 1944, PHPT 32, p. 344. Tyler’s claim that an unnamed Hawaiian radio station provided a beacon for arriving US mainland aircraft by broadcasting music during the early morning hours is suspect. Both Honolulu radio stations went off the air at their regular closing time of 11:00 P.M. Saturday night. They resumed broadcasts at 6:00 A.M. Sunday morning with public service programming that included church services, according to the technician logs of KGMB and KGU and schedules published in the Star-Bulletin on December 6, 1941. See the KGMB and KGU technician logs, Hamilton Library, Manoa Campus, University of Hawaii, Honolulu.
 20. For Lieutenant General Walter Short’s directive placing US Army early warning radar in operation at 4:00 A.M. on Sunday December 7, 1941, see standing operating procedure, US Army Hawaiian Department, dated 5 November 1941, pp. 1–20 in the Walter Short papers, Box 1–2, Hoover Institution Archives, Stanford University, Stanford, California. See also testimony concerning the hours of operation of the US Army’s Hawaiian early warning radar by Colonel Bernard Thielen to the Joint Committee Investigation of the Pearl Harbor Attack, November 15, 1945, PHPT 1, p. 39.
 21. For Lt. Gen. Walter Short’s “most dangerous time” quote, see the Hoover Institution Archives, Stanford University.
 22. For Kermit Tyler’s quote “only officer present,” see his testimony to the Roberts Commission, January 1942, PHPT 22, pp. 220 ff., also his testimony to the Army Pearl Harbor Board in 1944, PHPT 27, pp. 566 ff.
 23. For Major Kenneth Berquis’s statement that his mind was not clear on what he did the morning of December 7, 1941, see his testimony to the Roberts Commission, PHPT 22, p. 231 ff.
 24. Lt. General George Grunert’s “cock-eyed” quote followed Kermit Tyler’s testimony concerning the Opana radar debacle. See the Army Pearl Harbor Board Proceedings of August 17, 1944, PHPT 27, pp. 571, 572:
GRUNERT: Then it appears that the organization seemed to be faulty, and its instruction faulty, and there seemed to be a lack of organization and common sense and reason on this. You went up there to do duty as a pursuit officer in the information center. There was nobody to do the work with, because the controller was not there, and the Navy liaison man wasn’t there, and probably some others were missing, so you couldn’t do your duty, as a pursuit officer, because there was nobody to do duty with; and then, at the end of the tour at 7 o’clock, everybody disappeared except the telephone operator and you, and the telephone operator remained there for apparently no reason. You had no particular duty, did you?
TYLER: No sir; we hadn’t.
GRUNERT: It seems all cock-eyed to me and that, on the record, too.
 25. For details on USS Ward and USS Condor sighting and depth-charging a Japanese midget sub, see PHPT 39, p. 496. For the radio report on the depth charge by USS Ward, see PHPT 37, p. 704.
 26. For the testimony of William Outerbridge of USS Ward, see PHPT 36, pp. 55 ff.
 27. For the “broken out of bunk” testimony of Lieut. Oliver Underkofler, see PHPT 36, p. 276.
 28. For a discussion of the total loss of the five Japanese midget subs, see PHPT 23, p. 1034.
 29. For the testimony of Lt. Cdr. Harold Kaminski, duty officer of the Fourteenth Naval District, see PHPT 11, p. 5293.
 30. For Admirals Kimmel and Bloch being notified of the submarine report, see PHPT 13, p. 491.

1. For Kimmel and Short's golf date, see PHPT 32, p. 283.
2. Death toll on the Arizona was 1,177 persons killed; for the Navy damage report, see PHPT 24, p. 1603.
3. At least seven torpedoes and two bomb hits struck the West Virginia, killing Captain Bennion. For damage to the West Virginia, see Vice Admiral Homer N. Wallin, Pearl Harbor: Why, How, Fleet Salvage and Final Appraisal (USGPO Naval History Division, 1968), p. 233; for death of Bennion, see ibid., p. 155.
4. Some 2,334 persons were killed in Hawaii by the December 7 attack, per the US Naval Chronology World War II (USGPO, 1955), p. 13. A revised US Navy casualty figure was released by Fleet Admiral Ernest J. King in 1946 (but dated April 23, 1944) listing US Navy and Marine Corps losses at 2117 persons killed and 960 persons missing; see Fleet Admiral Ernest J. King, The US Navy At War (USGPO US Navy Department, 1946), p. 11. There were 68 deaths on Guam, per the report of Captain George J. McMillin (Navy governor of Guam in 1941, taken as a POW by Japan) to the Secretary of the Navy, dated September 11, 1945. McMillin wrote that there were 427 American military and 381 Guamanians involved in the island's defense on December 8, 1941 (Guam Time). For McMillin's letter and enclosures, see Guam file, RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file. For casualties at Wake, see report of Edwin Layton to Admiral Chester Nimitz, dated September 17, 1942 in RG 80 PHLO, MMRB, Archives II. POW deaths are not included here, nor are Philippine casualties.
5. For account of the attack given by Commander Mitsuo Fuchida to Lieutenant Commander James A. Field, Jr., on October 10, 1945, see the transcript in United States Strategic Bombing Survey, Interrogations of Japanese Officials, Volume I (USGPO, 1946), p. 122.
6. On Lawrence McCutcheon, see Rich Pedroncelli, "Pearl Harbor, The First to Fall," Naval History, (December 1996), p. 56. See also Gordon Prange's interview with Jinichi Goto in At Dawn We Slept (McGraw Hill Book Company, 1981), pp. 509, 819. For the attack on the Maryland, see PHPT 1, p. 45.
7. For Rear Admiral Walter Anderson's account of December 7, 1941, see Wallin, Pearl Harbor, pp. 152 ff.
8. For Chief Boatswain's Mate Lewis W. Adkins, see ibid., pp. 157, 326.
9. For heroic actions of John B. Vaessen, see ibid., pp. 148, 178.
10. For damage details, refloating warships etc., see ibid. See also the testimony of Rear Admiral T. B. Inglis and Colonel Bernard Thielen to the Joint Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbor Attack, in PHPT 1, p. 26 ff.
11. See December 7, 1941 logs of the Honolulu Fire and Police Departments, Hawaiian War Records, Hamilton Library, Manoa Campus, University of Hawaii, Honolulu, copies in author's file. For civilian deaths and injuries, see the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, 1st, 2nd, and 3rd extra editions, University of California, Doe Library, newspaper room, Berkeley, California, also copies in author's file. Wallin, Pearl Harbor, lists sixteen capital ships with major damage: USS California, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Oklahoma, Arizona, Utah, Maryland, Tennessee, Raleigh, Curtiss, Oglala, Shaw, Vestal, Honolulu, Downes, and Cassin. Under the category of "destroyed or never to fight again": Arizona, Utah, Shaw, and Oklahoma. Machinery was removed from the Downes and the Cassin and installed in new hulls at Mare Island Navy Shipyard, Vallejo, California.
12. For the US Army radar plot indicating Japanese aircraft were tracked north, see testimony of Colonel Bernard Thielen in PHPT 1, pp. 141 ff. For Admiral Nagumo's disclosure that Pacific Fleet aircraft pursued the First Air Fleet, see his report transmitted to Admiral Yamamoto on December 17, 1941 in RG 457, SRN 115372, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
13. For Radioman 1/c Donovan Chase's written comments, see the Station H operator log for December 8, 1941, Tokyo Time, pp. 144 ff., RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II. According to Chase's log, the Japanese pilots transmitted on 6581 kilocycles and used plain Japanese, not navy code. Chase translated Japanese to English in the log. Author interview with Donovan Chase, January 15, 1988, Santa Rosa, California, audio tape and transcript in author's file. At about this time, Airman 1/c Shigenori Nishikaichi, a fighter pilot on the Hiryu, crash-landed on Niihau, a privately owned 18-mile-long island off Kauai's west coast. Nishikaichi briefly seized the island but an unarmed resident, Ben Kanahale, grabbed the pilot and threw him against a rock wall. The airman died instantly. See Alan Beekman, The Niihau Incident (Heritage Press of Pacific, 1982), pp. 25 ff.
14. See the original copy of the US Army's Opana tracking chart, General Walter Short Papers, Hoover Institution Archives, Stanford University, Stanford, California. The Opana site was located on Kahuku Point at the northeast corner of Oahu. See the map of Oahu on p. 64 of this book.
15. For reports on the shooting down of a Japanese fighter by two scout planes from the USS Northampton, see PHPT 1, p. 61; PHPT 24, p. 1607; PHPT 37, pp. 955, 1220, 1252.

1. See report in Chicago Tribune, December 18, 1941; see report in The Capital, December 19, 1941.
2. For Senator Vandenberg's proposal, see an abridged version of a letter written by Vandenberg to FDR on December 15, 1941, Arthur H. Vandenberg Jr., ed. The Private Papers of Arthur Vandenberg (Houghton Mifflin, 1953), p. 24; for Vandenberg's Civil War quote excised from the December 15, 1941 letter just cited, see PHPT 24, p. 1298. Vandenberg, briefly an isolationist candidate for president, survived the 1940 New Deal election sweep.
3. See Max Freedman, ed., Roosevelt and Frankfurter (Atlantic Little, Brown, 1967), p. 644, entry of January 17, 1942.
4. For the full report entitled Proceedings of the Roberts Commission, see PHPTs 22 and 23 (testimony) and 24 (exhibits) printed in the Report of the Joint Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbor Attack (Congress of the United States, 1946). Available at most major libraries.
5. See the United Press story by Joseph L. Myler, that appeared in the Oakland Tribune and other major Sunday papers, on January 25, 1942.
6. For condemnation of the Roberts Report by Admiral James Richardson, On The Treadmill to Pearl Harbor (Department of the Navy, Navy History Division, 1973), p. 453.
7. Congress "never got the full story," see Max Freedman, ed., Roosevelt and Frankfurter, p. 645.
8. For Admiral Leigh Noyes's "destruction order" see PHPT 10, p. 4739; Captain Laurance Safford testified that Admiral Noyes was concerned with spread of rumors and, according to Safford, told him, "If you have got any notes or anything in writing, destroy them because somebody might see them and start something which you don't intend," PHPT 8, p. 3571.
9. See McCollum's memorandum printed in Appendix A of this book.
10. For Fleet Admiral Ernest King's order see CNO Serial 182206, September 17, 1945; RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB, Archives II, copy in author's file.
11. See Proceedings of the Thurmond-Spence hearing, April 27, 1995, tape and official transcript by the United States Senate Armed Services Committee, transcript furnished author by Husband E. Kimmel II, grandson of the Admiral.
12. For Honigman's testimony, see transcript of the Thurmond-Spence probe, April 27, 1995, p. 9 ff., copy in author's file.
13. See the report dated December 15, 1995, issued by Undersecretary of Defense Edwin Dorn, Department of Defense, The Pentagon, copy in author's file. On May 25, 1999, the US Senate in a split vote "cleared" Admiral Husband E. Kimmel and Lieutenant Walter C. Short of dereliction of duty charges. See New York Times, p. A-26, May 26, 1999.
14. For John Taylor not listed or reported as a witness, see ibid.

INDEX

Abend, Hallett
Abukuma
Ackerman, Carl
Adams, Emory S.
Adkins, Lewis W.
Adler Tag (Eagle Day)
Admiral Kimmel's Story (Kimmel)
Advertiser
Agawa, Hiroyuki
Aircraft Warning Service (AWS)
Air Flotilla
Air Flotilla
Akagi, HIMJS
Albertson, Maynard
All clear message
Allen, Preston
Amagisan Maru
Ambassadorial codes
Ambrose, Stephen
American Telephone & Telegraph
Anderson, Walter Stratton attack on Pearl Harbor and
 espionage activities and
 Exercise and,
Andrews, Frank
Antares, USS
Aoba
Archives II
Arizona, USS
Army, US
 casualties in decryption operations and final Japanese messages and
Army Pearl Harbor Board
Asiatic Fleet
Associated Oil Company
Associated Press
Astrid, Princess
Atlantic Charter conference
Atlantic Fleet
Augusta, USS
Awajisan Maru
Azerbaidjan

Bacon, Francis
Bako Navy Base
Barkley, Alben
BATONE
Battle of Britain
Battle of Midway
Battle of Wake Island

Battleship Row
Beardall, John
Bennion, Mervyn
Beppu
Berle, Adolf, Jr.
Berndtson, C. W.
Berne List
Berquist, Kenneth Biddle, Francis
Bishop, Max W.
Black, F. L.
Bloch, Claude
Blue, USS
Bolivia
Bomb plot grids
Bordeau Maru
Borneo
Boxer Rebellion
Bratton, Rufus
Brewster, Owen
Bridges, Styles Britain bombing of
 decryption operations and eight-action memorandum and embargo and
 espionage activities and
Britain (cont.)
 Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere
 and Lend-Lease program and National Emergency Declaration and Netherlands and preparation for Japanese surprise moves
Brotherhood, Francis M.
Brown, Anthony Cave
Brown, Cecil
Bungo Strait

California, USS
Callaghan, Daniel J.
Call-Bulletin
Camalier and Buckley Campaigns of the Pacific War, The Campbell, Mary Canada
Capital, The Carr, Denzel
Carreiro, John J.
Carrier Division Five
Carrier Division Four
Carrier Division One
Carrier Division Three Carrier Division Two
Carrier Route

Carrier Route
Carter, Jimmy
Cassin, USS
CBS radio
Chamberlain, John
Chase, Donovan
Chiang Kai-shek
Chicago Daily News
Chicago Tribune
Chichi Jima
Chikuma
China
 eight-action memorandum and naval recall from Churchill, Winston
Clark Air Field
Classical Composer Seamounts
Clausen, Henry
Code Book A
Code Book D, See also Num code
Code Book S
Codebreakers (Kahn)
Colorado, USS
Combined Air Force
Combined Fleet
Commercial Pacific Cable
Committee to Conduct the War Condition X-Ray
Condor, USS
Connally, Tom
Cooke, Charles ("Savvy"), Jr.
COPEK
Corregidor
Crane File (Station US Papers)
Crim, Howell
Cruiser Division Eight
Cryptography. See Decryption
Cryptolog
Cunningham, Winfield
Currier, Prescott
Cuyama, USS

Decryption, See also Radio intercepts; specific codes
 Americans cleared to read code system destruction orders and description of operations and facilities direct method
 early success with of espionage messages failure to share information of final Japanese messages four primary systems in Japanese attempts to foil

- List and
 - map of stations
 - of new signals
 - official denial of usefulness
 - revealed to press
 - safeguards taken in
- Decryption machines, See also
 - Purple machines
- Destroyer Squadron Five
- Destroyer Squadron One
- Deutsch, John
- Devereux, James
- Dewey, Thomas E.
- DeWitt, John
- Diplomatic intercepts, Americans cleared to read
- Direction finding (DF)
- Direct method
- Donovan, William ("Wild Bill")
- Dorn, Edwin
- Dowd, Robert
- Downes*, USS
- Draft Act
- Driscoll, Agnes Meyer
- Driscoll, William
- Dutch East Indies. See Netherlands East Indies
- Dutch Harbor
- Dyer, Thomas
- Early, Steve
- Eight-action memorandum, xii
 - author's discovery of
 - description of actions
 - disclosure of blocked
 - falling into place of all actions
 - predictions of fulfilled
 - strategic dangers listed in
 - text of
- Eisenhower, Dwight D.
- Eleventh Air Fleet
- Elliott, George
- Emanuel, Theodore
- Embargo
- England. See Britain
- Enigma code
- Enterprise*, USS
- Espionage, See also
 - individual spies
 - all clear message
 - bomb plot grids and
 - errors in H-4
 - radio intercepts of
- Esquimalt
- Eto, Teisaku
- Etorofu Island
- Exercise

Fabian, Rudolph J.
Fabyan, George
Far East Combined Bureau
Fast Carrier Forces
Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) files of
Federal Records Center (FRC)
Ferdinand Magellan
Ferguson, Homer
Fifth Fleet
Finnegan, Joseph
First Air Fleet approach to Pearl Harbor
approach to U.S. territory attack on Pearl Harbor escape from Pearl Harbor Get Underway signal in Hitokappu Bay
5-Num code
crash of distribution plans decoding of delivery of Fleet Tactics
Fly, James
Ford, Henry
Ford Island
Forrestal, James
Fort Mills
Fort Myer
Fort Shafter
Fort Winfield Scott
Fourteenth Naval Division
Fourth Fleet
Fox, George
Fox, Robert France
Frankfurter, Felix
Freedman, Max
Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), xii,
French Indochina
Friedman, Elizabeth
Friedman, William F.
Fuchida, Mitsuo

Gaddy, David W.
Garstka, Henry F.
Genda, Minoru
Germany
decryption operations and diplomatic messages between Japan
and Enigma code and National Emergency Declaration and Gesell, Gerhard A.
Ghormley, Robert
Gilbert Islands
Gillette, Guy M.
Globe Wireless
Godwin, D. C.

Goto, Jinichi
Government Codes and Cipher School
Gramblin, Stanley
Grant, Hugh G.
Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere
Greber, C. F.
Greenslade, John Grew, Joseph
Grogan, Leslie
Grunert, George
Guam
Gunji, Kiichi
Gunther, John
Gunzoku
GUPID

H-4
Halifax, Lord
Halsey, William ("Bull")
Hara, Chuichi
Harada, T.
Harald, Prince
Hart, Thomas
 decryption operations and
 espionage activities and Japanese approach to Pearl Harbor and NIITAKA message and removal from Philippines
 war alert and
Hasegawa, Kiichi
Hawaii
Hayate, HIMJS
Hearst, William Randolph
Heiyo Maru
Henning, J. W.
Henriksen, George W.
Hewitt, Henry Kent
Hickam Field
Hiei, HIMJS
Hirohito, Emperor
Hiroshima bombing
Hiryu, HIMJS
Hitler, Adolf
Hitokappu Bay
Holland. See Netherlands
Honigman, Steve Honolulu
Honolulu, USS Hood, Harry
Hoover, J. Edgar Hopkins, Harry Horomushiro
Hosho, HIMJS
Hosmer, Ellsworth
Howard, Joseph C.
Howard, Roy
Huckins, Thomas

Hull, Cordell

I-10

I-19

I-21

I-23

Iba Field

Imperial Japanese Navy

Imperial Rescript

Indochina

Infamy (Toland)

Ingersoll, Royal

Inglis, T. B.

Inland Sea

Inoue, Shigeyoshi

Intelligence documents

International News Service

Isolationism

Italy

Jaluit

Japan

- approach to Pearl Harbor

- approach to U.S. territory

- attack on Pearl Harbor

- collapse of diplomatic negotiations with U.S.

- deadline message from

- decision to start war made by

- decryption and. See Decryption

- deteriorating relations with U.S.

- diplomatic messages between Germany
and

- embargo and

- escape from Pearl Harbor and

- espionage and. See Espionage

- fallback position of war preparations

- final messages of

- Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere

- losses in Pearl Harbor

- merchant marine ship recall

- message announcing beginning date of war

- naval recall from China

- order to destroy code systems

- pilot message of

- pop-up cruises and

- radio intercepts and. See Radio intercepts

- raw materials required by

- Southeast Asia invasion

- special telegram dispatched to

- submarines of sighted

- ten-point proposal and

- Tripartite Pact and

Japanese Consulate

Jeffers, Robinson
J series code (Tsu code)
 decoding of order to destroy

Kaena Point
Kaga, HIMJS
Kahn, David
Kaigun Ango code
Kamer
Kaminski, Harold Kana text
Kaneohe Naval Air Station
Kanoya Air Base
Kasuga Maru
Kasumigaura
Katakana
Katori, HIMJS
Katsuriki, HIMJS
Kauai
Kawazoe, Zenichi
Kaye, Jack
Keefe, Frank
Keibii
Keibii
Keibii
Khota Bharu
Kidd, Isaac
Kido Butai
Kilpatrick, W. S.
Kimmel, Husband E. appointment to command position
 attack on Pearl Harbor and attack plan leak denied to deceptive radio messages and demotion of eight-action memorandum and escaping forces and
 espionage activities and exclusion from intelligence network
 Exercise 191 and
 Heiyo Maru monitoring and imminent war delclaration and
 Japanese approach to Pearl Harbor and
 Japanese approach to U.S. territory and
 Japanese code system destruction and Japanese submarine sighting and naval recall from China and
 NIITAKA message and
 Pearl Harbor investigations and pop-up cruises and residence of Roberts Commission and secret press briefing and Vacant Sea policy and
 war alert and

King, Ernest J.
King George V, HMS
Kiplinger Newsletter
Kirishima, HIMJS
Kirishima Maru
Kirk, Alan Kisner, Homer
 daily routine of Hitokappu Bay operation and imminent war declaration and
 Japanese approach to Pearl Harbor and
 Japanese approach to U.S. territory and
 NIITAKA message and
Kita, Nagao
Knox, Dudley W.
Knox, Frank
Kobayashi, Ichizo
Koga, Mineichi
Kondo, Nobutake
Kongo Maru
Korea
Kotoshirodo, Richard Kramer, Alwin
Kra Peninsula
Kuma, HIMJS
Kure Naval Base
Kurile Islands
Kuromoti, Iki
Kuroshio Current Kwajalein
Kyokuto Maru
Kyushu

LA code
La Guardia, Fiorello
Layton, Edwin
Layton, Edwin (cont.)
 deceptive radio messages and
 Heiyo Maru monitoring and
 NIITAKA message and radio silence claims
Leahy, William D.
Leaked words
Le Hand, Marguerite ("Missy")
Lend-Lease program
Lexington, USS
Liaison Conference
Lietwiler, John
LIFE magazine
Liliuokalani, Queen
Lindbergh, Charles
Linder, H. D.
List 9
Lockard, Joseph
Long, Breckenridge
Lurline, SS

MacArthur, Douglas
decryption operations and
espionage activities and
final Japanese messages and
Japanese approach to Pearl Harbor and
NIITAKA message and
removal from Philippines
war alert and

MacKallor, Laurance L.

Mackay Radio & Telegraph
espionage activities and
Japanese contact of

Macy, Thomas S.

Magic

Magruder, John

Maizuru

Maizuru Special Landing Force

Malaya

Maloney, Francis T.

Manila

Mao Tse-tung

Marco Polo bridge

Mariana Islands

Marshall, George C.
final Japanese messages and
Pearl Harbor investigations and
Roberts Commission and secret press briefing

Marshall Islands

Martha, Princess

Marus recall of

Maryland, USS

Matsonia, SS

Matson Line

Matsuoka, Yosuke

Matthews, Herbert

Maxon, Yale

Maxon Alert

Mayfield, Irving

McCloy, Russell

McCollum, Arthur H.
See also Eight- action memorandum attack plan leak dismissed by background of code name of deadline message and Greenslade's supersecret contact with Hitokappu Bay operations and Hosmer's direct link with
Japanese approach to Pearl Harbor and
Japanese approach to U.S. territory and merchant marine ship recall and secret intelligence provided to Roosevelt

McConnell, John
McCormick, Robert
McCullough, Richard
McCutcheon, Lawrence
McDonald, Joseph
McMorris, Charles Horatio
Mellett, Lowell
Mid-Pacific Communications Intelligence Network
Midway Island
Midway Neutralization Unit
Mikami, John
Mikawa, Gunichi
Miles, Sherman
Military intercepts, Americans cleared to read Miyajima
Monographs
Morimura, Tadashi attempt to establish bank account bomb plot grids and disliked by diplomats flamboyant behavior of indulgences of job description of physical appearance of real name of surveillance on wiretap on telephone of Moss, John
Murozumi
Murphy, John
Murphy, Vincent R.
Murrow, Casey
Murrow, Edward R.
Murrow, Janet
Mussolini, Benito
Mutual Telephone Company
Myler, Joseph L.

Nagano, Osami
Nagasaki bombing
Nagato, HIMJS
Nagumo, Chuichi approach to Pearl Harbor and approach to U.S. territory and Nakatsuka, Lawrence
National Archives
 See also Archives II
National Emergency Declaration
National Guard
National Security Agency (NSA)
National Security Group Command
 (NSGC)
Natori, HIMJS
Naval History magazine
Navy, U.S.
 casualties in

- creation of two-ocean
- decryption operations and
- espionage activities and
- Roosevelt's restructuring of
- West Coast Communications Intelligence Network

NBC radio

Netherlands

- decryption operations and
- eight-action memorandum and
- radio intercepts and

Netherlands East Indies

Nevada, USS

Newman, Irwin

Newsweek

New York Herald Tribune

New York Times

NIITAKA message

Nimitz, Chester

Nippu Jiji

Nissho Maru

Nitta Maru

Nomura, Kichisaburo

Northampton, USS

Noyes, Leigh

Nye, Gerald

Oahu

O'Connor, Kathleen

Office of Naval Intelligence (ONI)

Ogg, Robert

Oglala, USS

Oikawa, Koshiro

Oil, See also Embargo

Oil-licensing system

Oita

Oite code. See PA code

Okins, Elliott

Oklahoma, USS

Okuda, Otojiro

Olav, Crown Prince

Ominato

On-the-Roof Gang

Operation Order No. 1 (OPORD 1)

Operation Sea Lion

Opinion polls on war

Oshima, Hiroshi

Outerbridge, William

PA code

Pacific Fleet, xii

- attack on Pearl Harbor and
- decryption operations and
- Japanese approach to Pearl Harbor and
- Japanese approach to U.S. territory and
- plans to attack
- pursuit of escaping forces

- Vacant Sea policy and
- war alert and
- Pacific Strategic Intelligence Section (PSIS)
 - Panama Canal
- Panama Sea Frontier
- Pan American Airways
- Pang, Harry L.
- Pearl Harbor
 - attack on
 - casualties in
 - Exercise 191 and
 - first radio intercepts identifying
 - Japanese escape route from
 - leak of attack plan
 - map of
 - war alert and
- "Pearl Harbor" (Jeffers)
- Pearl Harbor* (Wallin)
- Pearl Harbor investigations
 - decryption operations and
 - espionage activities and
 - final Japanese messages and
 - GUPID and
 - Hitokappu Bay operation and
 - information withheld from
 - Magic delivery and
 - TESTM dispatches and
 - war alert and
- Pearl Harbor Liaison Office Files (PHLO)
- Pease, George
- Pelletier, Jr., Albert J.
- Pennsylvania*, USS
- Perry, Matthew
- Perry, William
- Petropavlosk
- Philippines
- Philippine Sea
- Polio Institute
- Pooks Hill
- Pop-up cruises
- Port Arthur
- Portugal
- Post-Dispatch*
- Potomac*, USS
- Prince of Wales*, HMS
- Prisoners of war
- Prokofiev Seamount
- Purdy, F. W.
- Purple Code
 - beginning date of war revealed in
 - decoding of
 - delivery of
 - description of
 - uses of
- Purple machines
- Pusan

Pye, William S.

Raboul

Radar operations

Radio call sign code

Radio direction finding (RDF)

Radio Intelligence Publications (RIP). See
RIP

Radio intercepts See also Decryption

deceptive information provided for dual-frequency transmissions and of espionage activities

first indication of Pearl Harbor as target of Heiyo Maru

from Hitokappu Bay

of imminent war declaration of Japanese approach to Pearl Harbor of Japanese approach to U.S. territory of Japanese fleet movements knowledge of Japanese communication procedures in leaked words and

Magic

of merchant marine ship recall of Netherlands East Indies situation of NIITAKA message of oil transportation

radio silence and raw scoop watch and

seven categories of skills required by personnel storms and

Raft, George

Ragnhild, Princess

Raleigh, USS

Randle, Jesse

Ranger, USS

Rankin, Jeannette

Ranneft, Johan

RCA Communications

espionage activities and

Japanese contact of

Redman, Joseph

Reilly, Mike

Reno, Janet

Repulse, HMS

Richardson, James O.

objection to basing of fleet

on Roberts Commission

RIP

RIP

RIP

RIP

RIP

RIP
Roberts, Owen J.
Roberts Commission
Rochefort, Fay
Rochefort, Janet
Rochefort, Joseph J.
 background of
 deceptive radio messages and embargo and
 espionage activities and Hitokappu Bay operations and
 Japanese approach to Pearl Harbor and
 Japanese approach to U.S. territory and
 Japanese code system destruction and Japanese submarine sighting and
 naval recall from China and
 NIITAKA message and
 Oral History
 scoop watch ordered by ten-point proposal and
Rochefort, Joseph J., Jr.
Roosevelt, Betsey
Roosevelt, Eleanor Roosevelt, Franklin D.
 American opposition to war and attempt to unite country on defense policy audio recordings of conflict with Richardson
 deadline message and
 decryption operations and distancing from Rochefort's warnings early knowledge of Japanese strategy eight-action memorandum and embargo and
 espionage activities and
 final Japanese messages and four steps toward war fourth-term campaign of Hitokappu Bay operations and intelligence provided by McCollum monographs of Murrow and National Emergency Declaration and naval recall from China and naval restructuring by Netherlands East Indies situation and Panama Canal closure and party for British representatives
 Pearl Harbor investigations and
 pop-up cruises and possibility of war suggested by press mislead by Princess Martha and removal of commanders from Philippines

Roberts Commission and
ten-point proposal and third-term campaign of Times editorial denounced by Vacant Sea policy and War Cabinet meeting warship locations delivered to

Roosevelt, James

Rorie, Durwood

Rosen, Leo

Russia

Russian Fleet

Ryujo, HIMJS

S code

Safford, Laurance

Saipan

Sama Naval Base

Saratoga, USS

Sarnoff, David

Sasebo

Schlesinger, Arthur, Jr.

Schreiber, Ricardo Rivera

Schulz, Lester R.

Scoop watch

Scripps-Howard News Alliance

Seale, William

Seaward, Paul E.

Sebald, W. J.

Second Fleet

Seki, Kokichi

Sepulga, USS

Shakespeare, William

Shanghai radio station

Shaw USS

Sherwood, Robert

Shikoku

Shimada, Koiichi

Shimada, Shigetaro

Shimizu, Mitsumi

Shin code. See S code

Ship Movement code. See SM code

Shiriya, HIMJS

Shivers, Robert

Shokaku, HIMJS

Short, Walter

 escaping forces and

 espionage activities and

Short, Walter (cont.)

 exclusion from intelligence network

 final Japanese messages and

 Japanese submarine sightings and

 NIITAKA message and

 Pearl Harbor investigations and

 Roberts Commission and

 secret press briefing and

- war alert and
- Siam (Thailand)
- Simons, R. Bentham
- Singapore
- Sinkov, Abraham
- Sixth Fleet
- Skelton, Red
- SM code
- Smith, Ralph C.
- Smith, Walter Bedell
- Smith-Hutton, Henri
- Soryu*, HIMJS
- Southeast Asia
- Southern Expeditionary Fleet
- Spence, Floyd
- Spencer, A. C.
- Sperber, Ann
- Star-Bulletin*
- Stark, Harold
 - appointment to command position
 - final Japanese messages and
 - Hitokappu Bay operation and
 - meetings with Roosevelt
 - Roberts Commission and
 - war alert and
- Station AE
- Station BAKER
- Station CAST
 - beginning date of war intercepted by
 - espionage activities and
 - Hitokappu Bay intercepts and
 - interviews with personnel
 - Japanese approach to Pearl Harbor and
 - Japanese approach to U.S. territory and
 - NIITAKA message and
- Station FIVE
- Station FOUR
- Station H
 - escape from Pearl Harbor and
 - espionage activities and
 - Heiyo Maru* monitoring and
 - Hitokappu Bay intercepts and
 - imminent war declaration and
 - interviews with personnel
 - Japanese approach to Pearl Harbor and
 - Japanese approach to U.S. territory and
 - Japanese fleet movements and
 - naval recall from China and
 - NIITAKA message and
- Station HYPO
 - description of operations
 - espionage activities and
 - failure to share information with FIVE
 - interviews with personnel
 - Japanese approach to Pearl Harbor and
 - Japanese approach to U.S. territory and

naval recall from China and
NIITAKA message and
Station ITEM
Station JCS
Station KING Station M Station SAIL
 deadline message and
 espionage activities and
 final Japanese messages and
 Heiyo Maru monitoring and
 Japanese approach to Pearl Harbor and Japanese-German messages intercepted
 by oil transportation monitored by Station SEVEN Station SIX Station TWO Station US
 beginning date of war intercepted by
 espionage activities and
 final Japanese messages and
 Japanese approach to Pearl Harbor and
 Japanese approach to U.S. territory and Station US Papers (Crane File)
Station VICTOR Station WAR Station X
Stevens, Thomas
Stimson, Henry L., xii
Street, George
Studemann, William Sukumo Bay
Suo-Nada
Sweeney, Martin L.
Szymanski, S. A.

Taft, Robert
Taiyo, HIMJS. See Kasuga Maru
Takahashi, Ibo
Takao
Takao Navy Base
Tarawa
Tasukawa Maru
Tatsuta, HIMJS
Tatsuta Maru
Taylor, John
Taylor, Telford
Tennessee, USS
Tenryu, HIMJS
Ter Poorten, Hein
TESTM
Third Fleet
Thirteenth Naval District
Thomason, John W., Jr.
Thomson, Fred R.

Thurmond, Strom
Tillman, Frederick G.
Time
Timor
Togo, Shigenori
Tojo, Hideki
Tokai Maru
Tokosuka
Tokuyama
Tokyo radio station
Toland, John
Tomioka, Sadatoshi
Tone, HIMJS
Torres Strait
Travis, Edward Tripartite Pact
Truk
Truman, Harry
Tsu code. See J Series code
Tsukuhara, Nishizo
Tsurumi, HIMJS
Tully, Grace
Turner, Lana
Turner, Richmond K.
Tuscaloosa, USS
Twelfth Naval District
Tyler, Kermit
Type commanders

Ucluelet
Ugaki, Matome
Underkofler, Oliver
Underwood Typewriter Company
United Press
Uritski
Usa
Usher Books
Utah, USS
UTU Broadcasts

Vacant Sea policy
Vaessen, John
Vandenberg, Arthur
Vandenberg, Martin
Vanden Heuvel, William J.
Van Kleffens, Eelco
Van Mook, H. J.
Van Valkenburgh, Franklin
Van Voorhis, Daniel
Venzel, Frank
Vincent, Beverly
Von Doenhoff, Richard A.
Von Ribbentrop, Joachim

Wainwright, Jonathan Wake Island

Wallin, Homer N.
Wall Street Journal
War alert
War Cabinet
Ward, USS
War warnings
Watson, Edwin ("Pa")
Watts, Ethelbert
Weeks, Robert H.
Welles, Sumner
West Coast Communications Intelligence
 Network (WCCI)
Western Sea Frontier
Western Union
West Virginia, USS
Whitehead, Don
Whitehead, T. North
Whiting, Merrill F.
Whitlock, Duane
Whitten, Rodney L.
Wilkinson, Theodore S.
Willkie, Wendell
Winchell, Walter
Winds Code
Woodward, Farnsley
WT stations

Yamaguchi, Tamon
Yamamoto, Isoroku approach to Pearl Harbor and Exercise 191 and
 on imminence of war Morimura and naval recall from China and
 NIITAKA message and
 Operation Order No.
 radio silence order
 war plans of Yawata Maru
Yen monetary bloc
Yobidashi Fugo
Yokosuka
Yokosuka Navy Base
Yoshikawa, Takeo. See Morimura, Tadashi

Zerby, Barry
Zuhio, HIMJS
Zuikaku, HIMJS

[\[back\]](#) Roosevelt

F.D.R.

By Eustace Mullins

One of Franklin Delano Roosevelt's ancestors was Isaac Roosevelt, first director of the New York Trust after the Revolutionary War, when Alexander Hamilton betrayed our young Republic by funding the national debt and placing us in the hands of Jewish financiers in France and Holland.

As a young Harvard lawyer, FDR found himself one of the poorer Roosevelts. Old ex-President Theodore Roosevelt was living in comfort in Oyster Bay, after having made thirty-five million dollars profit in gold from the United States Treasury in one operation for J.P. Morgan Co. (Rothschild) & J. & W. Seligman Co., New York, when he purchased the Panama Canal. When he sued the New York World for libel for printing some of the more interesting particulars of this case, the United States Supreme Court unanimously threw out Roosevelt's suit.

His son, Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., was to do his bit for the family honor by acting as finger man in the hundred million dollar swindle, the Teapot Dome oil scandals of 1924. Despite the fact that he was publicized as the man who got Harding to sign the oil-land release to Sinclair, Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., then Assistant Secretary of the Navy, formerly director of Sinclair Oil Co., was not even called to testify at the Congressional Hearings. In Some unexplained manner, this distinguished American became a General in the United States Army, and, venturing too near the front lines in France during the Second World War, heard a gun go off nearby and fell dead of a heart attack, thus vindicating the fighting tradition of his family.

F.D. Roosevelt was appointed Assistant Secretary of the Navy in 1915 by the Christian Jew Woodrow Wilson (Wolfsohn), who was determined to fill Washington with his own tribe. In this position, Roosevelt endeared himself to Jewish munitions makers by spending four times the allotted amount for naval armaments, when he and his Zionist friends knew two years before anyone else that we were going into the First World War. Roosevelt's reward came in 1923, when Baruch made him the head of United European Investors, Ltd., which made millions of dollars profit from the mark inflation in Germany. Thus Roosevelt had his first taste of Profiting from the misery of the poor, a sensation dear to the heart of every Hebrew usurer.

Roosevelt then set up his Wall Street law firm of Roosevelt and O'Connor, which did remarkably well, but he was intended by the Sanhedrin for higher things. He was made Governor of New York in 1928, when he helped sabotage the campaign of Al Smith for President in favor of the Rothschild candidate Herbert Hoover, who has an interesting history of suits against him in the law courts of London. Hoover's talent for keeping out of jail is one of the marvels of the twentieth century, and is documented by no less than five biographies, complete with photostats of court records, in the Library of Congress. This writer is fortunate enough to own two of these rare and fascinating volumes, which he prizes highly in his collection of obscure Americana.

As Governor of New York Roosevelt displayed his passion for justice in the famous case of John Broderick. Broderick, State Superintendent of Banks of New York, was tried for criminal neglect of duty in the infamous Bank of the United States case, when depositors lost many thousands of dollars after the bank failed due to its Jewish officers overspeculating in Central Park West real estate. It was brought out at the trial that Broderick was aware of the serious difficulties of the Bank and did nothing about it. He seemed certain to go to prison, when the White Knight of World Jewry, F.D. Roosevelt, came in person to plead clemency for Broderick. The Judge was forced to bow to a superior political figure, and Broderick went free. Roosevelt flaunted his defiance of the depositors by immediately reinstating Broderick as State Superintendent of Banks. Not satisfied with this, Roosevelt again proved which side of the law he was on by appointing Broderick a Governor of the Federal Reserve Board of the United States, on that unhappy occasion when a misguided people elected this Zionist traitor President. Broderick has retired to a comfortable old age as President of the venerable East River savings Bank of New York City, after a career of public service in the democratic tradition.

The interests which forced Roosevelt's candidacy on the Democratic Party in 1932 have never been made public, but it is significant that they were such a dangerous group of revolutionists that at first even Baruch refused to be associated with the Roosevelt movement. My history of the Council on Foreign Relations proves by extensive documentation that international Jewish bankers elected Roosevelt President for one reason only, the recognition of Soviet Russia by the United States, for which Felix Warburg and Otto Kahn of Kuhn, Loeb Co., had struggled so hard throughout the 1920s. Roosevelt's predecessor, Herbert Hoover, had steadily refused to aid the Soviet Union. One of his London promotion schemes before the First World War had been interrupted by the Jewish Communists, and he never forgot it. Roosevelt, on the other hand, was only too happy to recognize and prove his loyalty to the Jewish Communist Government of Russia. He was always willing to do anything to please his friends. In return, of course, it was understood that they should do anything to please him, such as contribute large sums to his multi-million dollar infantile charity racket. The March of Dimes which his law partner Basil O'Connor inherited upon Roosevelt's sudden death at its headquarters at Warm Springs, Georgia. It is not beyond the realm of possibility that Roosevelt's mysterious death had nothing to do with world revolution at all, but was merely a gangster's quarrel over the division of the spoils, it being in the spring, when the Miles of Dimes were converted into stacks of dollars, after an unusually successful attack upon the purses of our generous people.

Roosevelt fulfilled his debt of gratitude to Jewish Communism by assigning important Government posts in Washington to leading Communist agitators and spies, such as his famous protege Alger Hiss.

One of Roosevelt's first great feats as President was the gigantic gold swindle which he and Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau put through, the Gold Trading Act of 1934, which officially committed our government to support Jewish bankers in their manipulation of the price of gold. After a stiff fight with the Supreme Court, Roosevelt jammed through this bit of treachery, because, as Morgenthau said, "If the Supreme Court had decided against us, we had legislation ready to push through Congress which would have given us the same result." This Morgenthau is the son of the Henry Morgenthau who paid Woodrow Wilson's way into the White House in 1912 so that Wilson could send him as U.S. Ambassador to Turkey, where World Zionists were completing the details of the Communist Revolution in Russia.

Morgenthau was also the author of the infamous Morgenthau Plan to wipe out the German people in 1944, which was broadcast to the German armies and caused the lives of thousands of American boys to be sacrificed because the Germans were warned what would happen after they surrendered. This Plan, so determined in its ruthlessness that it aroused the horror of the civilized world, is typical of Jewish Communist efforts to slaughter whole peoples.

<http://www.yamaguchy.netfirms.com/7897401/mullins/fdr.html>

此れこそ真珠湾攻撃の真相だ

"In politics,
nothing happens by accident.
If it happens,
you can bet
it was planned that way."
F.D.R.

COVER DESIGN BY DAVID K. LOBENBERG

Lobenberg recieved his masters degree in graphic design from the University of California at Los Angeles. Mr. Lobenberg's explosive cover reflects his unique talent in working with the author to graphically depict the essence of global deceit and hypocrisy.

THE WAR LORDS OF WASHINGTON (secrets of Pearl Harbor)

An Interview With Col. Curtis Dall

by Anthony J. Hilder

長崎原爆

This book is dedicated to the innocent men, women and children who were mass-murdered in the most vicious atrocities in the History of Mankind — the dropping of the atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki; to the men of Pearl Harbor whose "lives were sacrificed" to set the stage for World War II; and to the "brave men" who gallantly fought and died on "both" sides of the conflict believing that their blood was shed in the pursuit of freedom.

By presenting this document to the Freedom Loving People of Japan, exposing the events which led to World War II, it is our prayer that we can prevent World War III.

Whatever the cost, we will destroy the "conspirators", whose crimes are against humanity . . . for freedom to live they must die. Never in the annals of human history have so few done so much, so often, to hurt so many as the International Bankers and their War Lords of Washington.

PUBLISHER'S NOTE

Over the past two-and-one-half decades, the American people have heard a number of stories concerning the event known to history as Pearl Harbor, which launched American involvement in World War Two.

For one thing, attempts have been made in the past to portray President Franklin Delano Roosevelt as a man who deliberately invited the Japanese attack, so as to allow him to get the United States into war on a solid footing.

Others have said other things.

Some historians have attempted to gloss over the whole affair, portraying Roosevelt's role in the great tragedy as merely that of a well meaning man who accidentally found himself in a very bad position. Still others have alleged that he not only knew full well exactly what the Japanese were doing, but that he, in fact, conspired with them to bring on the Pearl Harbor catastrophe.

A third group insists that Roosevelt and his many pro-Communist advisors wanted to involve America in the war against Germany—so that Russia could grab all of Eastern Europe—but that the Japanese did not know, when they launched their attack on Hawaii, that they were being used as the catalyst.

The War Lords of Washington

This book is an attempt to set the record straight, once and for all.

Col. Curtis Dall, interviewed here by National Educator reporter Anthony Hilder, is the former son-in-law of the late President, who was privy to many of the secret maneuvers that went on in the White House and in the State Department at that time. Better than any other living American, Dall is able to put the entire affair into proper perspective—laying the blame where it properly belongs.

Some will disagree with his conclusions—for reasons best known to themselves—but none can deny his facts.

THE PUBLISHER

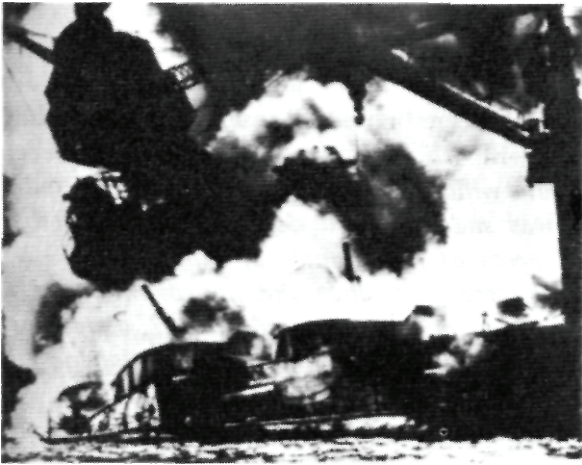

COLONEL DALL'S INTRODUCTION

I welcome this opportunity to bring you the true story of the events which led to the attack at Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941. This attack was not only provoked but welcomed by the International Banking Cartelists and their agents working within the higher echelon of government within the United States. It was fully known—well in advance with enough notice to have averted the catastrophe which fell upon the peace-loving people of both our great nations. These same International Banking Cartelists conspire for a world dictatorship through a one-world U.N. type government, with an international police force and a one-world currency . . . not for the emancipation of man but the enslavement of mankind. They seek to downgrade and destroy the great culture and heritage of Japan and America. Under the guise of promoting world peace, they deliberately brought on world war. These same international war conspirators and their agents deliberately delayed the end of World War II so they could set up the fall of China to Mao Tse-Tung. While building your enemy on the Chinese mainland, they surrendered eastern Europe to international communism.

The War Lords of Washington

They deliberately extended the war to allow the Red Russian butchers to take over North Korea—they then sold Japan's Sakhalin Island and your Kurile Islands to the North into slavery, so as to give them a strategic stranglehold at your throat. It was these international war conspirators, closely associated with the Council on Foreign Relations in the United States, that ordered the dropping of the atomic bomb at Hiroshima and Nagasaki which mass-murdered innocent men, women and children and burned babies alive in their cribs. This wanton atrocity was surpassed only by the massacre of Dresden. I will show that the destruction of Hiroshima and Nagasaki were ordered after—I repeat, after the Japanese government had made official overtures for peace.

Colonel Curtis B. Dall
Chairman Emeritus
Board of Policy
Liberty Lobby, Washington, D. C.

ADVANCE COMMENTARY

MR. HILDER: It was Monday, December 8, 1941, Japan time, and Sunday, December 7, 1941, American time—7:55 in the morning. At this moment, Pearl Harbor, the U.S. Naval Station on the Hawaiian Islands, was suddenly awakened with the roar of 54 Japanese dive bombers, 45 fighter planes, 40 torpedo bombers, and 50 low-level bombers. At 8:00 a.m. the U.S. Military Band started playing the STAR SPANGLED BANNER, as simultaneously, the first air torpedo hit. At 8:10 a.m., the battleship ARIZONA blew up. It seems the bomb landed alongside the second turret, crashed through the forecastle ... a huge ball of fire and smoke mushroomed 500 feet into the air. By 8:50 a.m., a second wave of 35 fighters, and 135 low-level dive bombers converged on Pearl Harbor.

The attack took the Commanding Officers, Admiral Husband E. Kimmel and General Walter C. Short, and their men and ships, by complete surprise.

On Monday, December 8, at 12:29, President Roosevelt was in the Nation's Capitol Building where all Representatives,

The War Lords of Washington

Senators, Cabinet Members, and Supreme Court Justices of the U.S. had been invited—Roosevelt grasped the podium beginning with this sentence: "Yesterday, December 7, 1941—a date which will live in infamy—the United States of America was suddenly and deliberately attacked by Naval and Air Forces of the Empire of Japan. . . . I ask that the Congress declare that since the unprovoked and dastardly attack by Japan on Sunday, December 7, a state of war has existed between the United States and the Japanese Empire,"

Colonel Dall, why do you feel it imperative that the people of Japan hear this message?

COL. DALL: Because it was the Pearl Harbor attack that brought America into the Second World War via a devious backdoor route, as it were, and from the War. America and Japan received nothing but casualties, debt, and loss. While Soviet Russia and their international Socialistic Dictatorship won half of Europe and Asia. We in America got nothing from it except 292,000 dead, 672,000 wounded, and a bill for about 350 billion dollars or about 1 26 trillion yen. As for Japan the near total destruction of the Japanese Empire concluded with the atrocities at Hiroshima and Nagasaki which were unparalleled in the history of the earth. Instead of World Peace, we got World War with various brush-fire wars—like Korea in 1950 and Vietnam since 1961. And now, more souped-up rumblings and power-plays in the Near East. For these reasons. I have concerned myself with Pearl Harbor, and have studied its background and the make-up of the forces that planned it.

MR. HILDER: Aside from the information you obtained within the inner circle of America's high government officials, did your "concern" cause you to investigate beyond Washington in the search for the true story of Pearl Harbor?

COL. DALL: Yes, on February 13, 1967, I was fortunate to have had a long talk with retired Admiral Husband A. Kimmel, the Commanding Officer at Pearl Harbor on that fatal day, December 7, 1941, who invited me to his home in Groton, Connecticut, for this purpose. This occasion was about twenty-six years later.

MR. HILDER: From your talk with Admiral Kimmel, and from your own research, Colonel, what problems must be explored with regard to Pearl Harbor?

COL. DALL: An American must look at that event from two angles. Most Americans will feel that, no matter how explained, or attempted to be explained, it remains, on the part of Japan, a surprise military attack on the United States, in violation of International Law, an attack that left 3303 of our forces dead, and 1272 wounded. These men were not alerted, and were completely unprepared to defend themselves! The second angle is a study to evaluate just what forces in America connived to provoke the attack, and planned it so as to force the United States to declare war against Japan. Such a declaration would have to include Germany and Italy, by the terms of the 1940 Tripartite Treaty. That fact was well understood by our State Department as well as the international bankers.

MR. HILDER: Then, you believe it is a crime of astronomical proportions that this attack was allowed to take place. But can we rightly assume that the Japanese Government did not wish the death of these men and only the destruction of the United States fleet?

COL. DALL: We, Americans, recognize that the surprise attack on Pearl Harbor was not primarily directed at people.

The War Lords of Washington

or at civilian centers, but for our men in uniform it surely was a complete and fatal surprise. When they finally realized that the crashing bombs were from Japanese aircraft, according to Walter Lord: "A seaman on the destroyer MONAGHAN told Boatswain's Mate, Thomas Donahue, 'Hell, I didn't even know they were sore at us!' "

MR. HILDER: Every patriotic American living felt the crushing impact of our great losses, but to believe that there were those in our own government that provoked such an act staggers the imagination. Will you expand upon the second angle?

COL. DALL: As briefly indicated, that second angle presents the reasonable question of just how a surprise of such magnitude was possible. An American recalls Tennyson's line in his "Charge of the Light Brigade" - surely "Someone had blundered." But, what is more, it was far more than what might be termed a blunder—that, instead, it had been duly planned that way.

MR. HILDER: Then you mean, Colonel Dall, that some powerful Americans—and some forces in America—had secretly worked to bring about the Pearl Harbor attack?

COL. DALL: I certainly do! That is just what famous historians like Dr. Harry Elmer Barnes and Professor Charles Callan Tansil and military men like Admiral Robert A. Theobald and Admiral Husband E. Kimmel have also concluded.

MR. HILDER: Would you please give us some specific evidence which these experts cite?

COL. DALL: Yes, indeed! For example, in the best laid plans, someone is quite likely to "spill the beans." That is exactly what the then Secretary of War, Henry L. Stimson, did in his diary entry for November 25, 1941. SECRETARY STIMSON stated: "The question was how we should maneuver them (the Japanese) into firing the first shot, without allowing too much damage to ourselves. It was a difficult proposition."

MR. HILDER: That's a stunning confession coming from a member of what has been called America's invisible government—the Council on Foreign Relations. Colonel, why would they want to entice or maneuver Japan into firing the first shot?

COL. DALL: Let me say that upon reviewing the description of that fateful conference of November 25, 1941, held at the White House, I find it heart-breaking to perceive that the strategy of my former father-in-law, President Roosevelt, and his close associates, was chiefly concerned with machinations - Not to maintain and preserve the peace but to set up or create "an incident," thereby involving the United States in a war with Japan! This would enable him to enter the war in Europe via the "back-door"! The realization, on his part, that the American people did not want war with Japan, and therefore, he and his backers must have it inflicted upon them at any cost, is most shocking! Hence, the factor of deceit entered the picture, and the necessary act of creating "an incident" to arouse great indignation, and an emotional outburst by the American people, became necessary! This dubious mantle had to be placed adroitly upon the shoulders of Japan. That was what Mr. Stimson referred to when he termed it "a difficult proposition."

The War Lords of Washington

The "proposition" had been made all the more difficult because the leader of the German people did not want a war with America, and refused to fall into the "trap" prepared by President Roosevelt and his ideological and political handlers. For the most part, they constituted some top one-world bankers, and their top pro-Zionist friends, who wanted to see Communist forces firmly controlling Germany, politically and financially, regrettably, for millions and millions of people, however, the "trap" was neatly baited, and Japan fell into it!

MR. HILDER: That answers the question why they wanted to maneuver Japan into the war. But, why did Secretary Stimson say it was "a difficult proposition" to do so?

COL. DALL: It was difficult because Japan and its Foreign Minister, Toyoda, in Washington - and Ambassador Nomura, as well as a Special Emissary Saburo Kurusu were sincerely endeavoring to work out a formula for peace with the United States and Britain. Even our own Ambassador, Joseph C. Grew, in Tokyo, when he forwarded Minister Toyoda's proposals to Secretary Hull, pleaded "(I urge) with all force at (my) command, for the sake of avoiding the obviously growing possibility of an utterly futile war between Japan and the United States, that this Japanese proposal not be turned aside without very prayerful consideration . . . The opportunity is here presented . . . for an act of highest statesmanship . . . with the possible overcoming thereby of apparently insurmountable obstacles for peace hereafter in the Pacific.

MR. HILDER: Was Secretary Hull a member of the Council on Foreign Relations as well?

COL. DALL: Most certainly.

MR. HILDER: What was the nature of these Japanese terms?

COL. DALL: On October 7, Foreign Minister Toyoda had told Ambassador Grew: (Minister Toyoda) "The Japanese Government is willing and prepared to return to the situation prevailing four years ago but it is essential that the Government of the United States of America should understand that to undo virtually at a moment's notice the work of the past four years is an undertaking of tremendous scope."

In effect, Japan re-stated the terms Minister Matsuoka and Prince Konoye had offered Washington in November 1940 through Bishop James E. Walsh, who was released from a Red Chinese prison in July 1970. Professor Tansill states: "Matsuoka asked Bishop James E. Walsh, Superior General of the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of Mary knoll, New York . . . to undertake a special mission to Washington in order to impress upon the President the fact that the Japanese Government 'wished to negotiate a peace agreement: An agreement to nullify their participation in the Axis Pact' . . . a guarantee to recall all military forces from China and to restore to China its geographical and political integrity."

Apparently, President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull chose to completely ignore these conciliatory "renunciations of Japan's objectives in China" in November, 1940, and rejected those of October, 1941, with what amounted to a ten-point ultimatum! Four years later, on November 15, 1945, Secretary Stimson, when testifying before a Congressional

The War Lords of Washington

Investigating Committee, describes that top-secret meeting of President Roosevelt on November 25, 1941, at the White House, with Secretaries Stimson, Hull, Knox, General Marshall and Admiral Stark: (SECRETARY STIMSON) "The President said that the Japanese were notorious for making an attack without warning . . . In spite of the risk involved, however, in letting the Japanese fire the first shot, we realized that in order to have the full support of the American people, it was desirable to make sure that the Japanese be the ones to do this ..."

Following that secret top level meeting, Secretary Hull, the next day-November 26, 1941, rejected Japan's conciliatory offer with a ten-point bellicose battery of demands, of which Professor Tansill writes: Both he and the President knew this program would be rejected by Japan. There was no thought of compromise or conciliation. In effect (it ordered:) 'The Government of Japan will withdraw all military, naval, air and police forces from China and from Indochina.'... It was obvious that the next step was war."

I will show, later, that these ultimate points had been outlined for Secretary Hull by Secretary Henry Morgenthau's Assistant, Harry Dexter White, a member of the Council on Foreign Relations, who was later proved to be an agent of the Communist Party.

MR. HILDER: Was Morgenthau a member of the Council on Foreign Relations?

COL. DALL: Most definitely! As foreseen by the President and his Cabinet. Emissary Kurusu, on seeing this harsh note, complained to Secretary Hall that this could be interpreted as tantamount to meaning the end." As a consequence, on December 6, the Japanese secretly sent their reply to Ambassador Nomura. Because our Intelligence had broken the so-called "Purple Code," it intercepted and decoded it. When President Roosevelt had read the first thirteen of its fourteen points, he correctly interpreted them in the words: "This means war!"

Of course, it did! Because, along with others, he had planned it that way.

MR. HILDER: Would you repeat that, Colonel?

COL. DALL: Yes. I said he planned it that way.

HR. HILDER: Was President Roosevelt a member of the Council of Foreign Relations too?

COL. DALL: Yes. At 9:00 a.m. on that Sunday morning, December 7, some four hours before the surprise attack, Admiral Stark got the fourteenth point of the Japanese reply in his office, he exclaimed to General Marshall, who was there with him: (Admiral Stark) "My God! This means war. I must get to Kimmel at once. "

MR. HILDER: If he had gotten the word to Admiral Kimmel, by phone, couldn't the surprise attack have been averted?

COL. DALL: Yes, I believe so! Admiral Robert A. Theobald called the fact that it was not done - "the Final Secret of Pearl Harbor." Some strong power, or pressure, not fully revealed to the American public, prevented Admiral Stark from properly and immediately alerting Admiral Kimmel! Kimmel, himself, told me: "Stark then said to Marshall: 'We must radio Kimmel, and alert him.' "Marshall overruled him and replied: Let's not! It might be detected by the Japanese and complicate things. I'll wire him later.' And he finally did just that, by means of regular commercial telegram . . . no urgency, no priority. Two hours, approximately, after all the bombs had fallen, I did receive Marshall's wire. "

The War Lords of Washington

MR. HILDER: Was Marshall a member of the Council of Foreign Relations too?

COL. DALL: Most certainly - yes.

MR. HILDER: This act would seem to negate all reason. General Marshall actually vetoed the alert for the reason that "it might be detected by the Japanese and complicate things?" This sounds very strange.

COL. DALL: Very strange, indeed! As previously stated, his reason reveals the calculated and ruthless tactics by which President Roosevelt and his top Council on Foreign Relations advisors and associates maneuvered to get us into World War II, against the strong wishes and desires of the American people.

Admiral Kimmel further explains: "Colonel Dall, this may further surprise you, but I found out later that the Japanese Task Force approaching Pearl Harbor had specific orders that if the American forces at Pearl Harbor became alerted before the attack was launched, their Task Force was to return at once to Japanese waters, without attacking!" This readily explains just what Marshall meant by fearing that a timely alert to Kimmel would complicate things. Admiral Theobald comments further: "With all chance of surprise gone the decision might well have been to cancel the attack. And the sole reason for not sending word to Hawaii on that Sunday morning. . . Washington refused to send one short message to Hawaii in time to cushion the effects of the Japanese attack! . . . There is only one conceivable reason for it—nothing must be done to prejudice the chances of the attack, even if at the last moment Japan was about to bring war to the United States, and President Roosevelt did not intend that any American action should cause them to change their plans at the last minute."

President Roosevelt had repeatedly assured the American people that he would not send their boys into a war on foreign soil "except in the case of attack." But, it appears he had also promised Prime Minister Churchill to get our country in, somehow! He had told the Prime Minister: I may never declare war. I may make war."

MR. HILDER: Would you repeat that, Colonel?

COL. DALL: Yes. President Roosevelt said: "I may never declare war. I may make war."

Thus, the Pearl Harbor attack, technically, took President Roosevelt off a delicate political hook, in terms of war. A month after this disaster, Churchill told Parliament: The probability since the Atlantic Conference (August 14, 1941) at which I discussed these matters with President Roosevelt, that the United States, even if not herself attacked, would come into the war in the Far East and thus make final victory assured"

Referring to this amazing Churchillian revelation, Senator Arthur H. Vandenburg of Michigan, reacted with the following shocked comment: "In other words, Churchill said that when he met Roosevelt the first time-and wrote 'The Atlantic Charter'—he ... got some sort of assurance, evidently satisfactory to him, that the United States would go to war with Japan, regardless of whether Japan attacked us or not. In still other words, we were slated for this war by the President, before Pearl Harbor."

The War Lords of Washington

Quite obviously, President Roosevelt and his circle of exploiters, strongly desired the Pearl Harbor attack so as to satisfy Winston Churchill, and other ideological forces, without technically violating his own solemn pledge made to the American people, not to get the Country into the war "except in the case of attack." Hence, after the lend-lease action, the convoying of British ships, the gift of fifty destroyers to the British, even the depth-bombing of German submarines—all extreme, un-neutral provocations—all of which had failed to provoke Hitler to retaliate, President Roosevelt's frustration—and that of his prompters—became rather desperate. His advisor, Harry Hopkins, another member of the Council on Foreign Relations, confessed: Both Stimson and Marshall felt that we couldn't win without getting into the war, but they had no idea how that is going to be accomplished. . . . He (Roosevelt) had said everything 'short of war' that could be said. He had no more tricks left. The 'hat' from which he had pulled so many 'rabbits' was empty."

The final trick left was to provoke and to deliberately insult Japan. Admiral Theobald comments: "The Tripartite Treaty of September, 1940, . . . supplied President Roosevelt with the answer. Under that treaty, war with Japan meant war with Germany and Italy."

Accordingly, President Roosevelt ordered the Pacific Fleet to stay anchored in Pearl Harbor, but removed all the aircraft carriers so that the battleships, like sitting ducks, would tempt Japan to strike them. No doubt, that is why F.D.R. refused to allow General Marshall to let Admiral Stark alert the Pearl Harbor Commanders to the oncoming attack. Captain Grenfell of the Royal Navy wrote: No reasonably informed person can now believe that Japan made a villainous, unexpected attack on the United States. An attack was not only fully expected, but was actually desired. It is beyond doubt that President Roosevelt wanted to get his country into the war, but for political reasons was most anxious to insure that the first act of hostility came from the other side; for which reason he caused increasing pressure to be put on the Japanese, to a point that no self-respecting nation could endure without resort to arms. Japan was meant, by the American President to attack the United States."

Furthermore, the British Minister of Production, Mr. Oliver Lyttleton, in 1944, aptly summed it up: "Japan was provoked into attacking America at Pearl Harbor. It is a travesty of history to say that America was forced into the war."

Perhaps the most irrefutable proof that President Roosevelt worked to set the stage for the Pearl Harbor attack and knew about it when it was coming, appears in H. Montgomery Hyde's book - "ROOM 3603: THE STORY OF THE BRITISH INTELLIGENCE." This describes, in detail, how William Stephenson, the Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service, operating from Room 3603, on the thirty-sixth floor of a skyscraper in Rockefeller Center, conspired with President Roosevelt and other top U.S. officials, to get the United States, into war with Japan, thereby drawing it into the war with the Axis—both of which the vast majority of Americans strongly opposed. Montgomery Hyde elaborated: "Stephenson had some success in penetrating the Kurusu mission with one of his agents who was a British subject and had spent fifty years in Japan . . . This agent made contact with the envoy's (Special Envoy Saburo Kurusu) Secretary, whose name was Yuki and had a series of meetings with him in a Washington apartment which had previously been wired for recording conversations.

The War Lords of Washington

"The information obtained from the recordings was transcribed and copies were sent by Stephenson each day to President Roosevelt . . . It supplemented the Japanese diplomatic telegrams between Tokyo and Washington, which had been known to the American authorities for some time. . . .

"On November 27, (1941), the President sent his son, James Roosevelt, to Stephenson with a special message, the purport of which was not yet known either to the British Foreign Office or to the British Embassy in Washington. The same day, Stephenson telegraphed it to London. His telegram read: 'JAPANESE NEGOTIATIONS OFF. SERVICES EXPECT ACTION WITHIN TWO WEEKS' I repeat: the telegram read: 'JAPANESE NEGOTIATIONS OFF. SERVICES EXPECT ACTION WITHIN TWO WEEKS.' "

"As can be imagined, this telegram caused a great stir in London. Confirmation was immediately sought by cable from Lord Halifax in Washington. Lord Halifax happened to be out hunting in Virginia when the cable arrived . . . and he was now obliged to get off his horse and hurry back to the Embassy to cable his reply that he knew nothing of such a report. Another urgent cable was sent from London, this time to Stephenson, informing him that the Prime Minister and the Cabinet would be most interested to know the source of his information. Stephenson answered briefly: 'The President of the U.S.A.' Two days later, November 29, CORDELL HULL saw Ambassador Halifax and gave him the news, officially." CORDELL HULL stated, and I quote: "The diplomatic part in our relations with Japan is virtually over. The matter will now go to the officials of the Army and Navy. Japan may now move suddenly and with every element of surprise."

How that surprise came, just over a week after this frank interview, is a matter of history.

MR. HILDER: How did President Roosevelt and his Cabinet react to the news of the actual attack on December 7th?

COL. DALL: Again, it is Secretary of War Stimson who destroyed the hypocritical image of shock and grief that President Roosevelt conveyed in his "DAY OF INFAMY" speech! Secretary Stimson admitted: "When the news first came that Japan had attacked us, my first feeling was of relief that the indecision was over and that the crisis had come in a way which would unite all our people. This continued to be my dominant feeling in spite of the news of catastrophies which quickly developed."

To a group of Senators and Congressmen on Pearl Harbor Day, President Roosevelt apparently had uppermost in his mind his pledge not to get the country into war "except in case of attack," exclaimed: (PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT) "Well, we were attacked. There is no question about that. "

Churchill in his "GRAND ALLIANCE," relates that Ambassador Winant and Averell Harriman and the members of the notorious Council on Foreign Relations were with him that evening. Referring to Roosevelt's words, Winant at first exclaimed: "Good! Good!" Churchill comments: "My two American friends took the shock with admirable fortitude. . . . In fact, one might almost have thought they had been delivered from a long pain."

The War Lords of Washington

That described reaction would be about "par for the course," for Averell Harriman. As for Churchill, himself, he confesses: "(I) went to bed that night to sleep the sleep of the saved and thankful." "No American will think it wrong of me if I proclaim that to have the United States at our side was to me the greatest joy." "It is what I dreamed of aimed at, and hoped for and now it has come to pass."

Apparently, President Roosevelt and his financial backers, along with Churchill and his banker backers, were the ones who, from the very start, had wanted war between America and Japan, between the Allies and Germany, and had duly planned and pushed for it. Germany had not wanted war, Japan had not wanted war, and, above all, the American people had not wanted war! But President Roosevelt and the one-world internationalist money powers wanted war! In fact, some historians find it was Roosevelt, prompted by those one-world financial interests, that induced both the British and the Poles to reject Hitler's reasonable proposal in August of 1939, for rectifying the Danzig and Corridor problems, thus providing Hitler, finally, just as Roosevelt provoked Japan, later on, to use force at Pearl Harbor. I quote the renowned historian, Dr. Harry Elmer Barnes, on this matter: "In reality, the responsibility for the Pearl Harbor surprise attack, from the Chicago Bridge speech of Roosevelt on October 5, 1937, to the appearance of the Japanese bombers over Pearl Harbor about 7:55 on December 7, 1941, is crystal clear and cumulative to all those who know the facts whether or not they are willing and courageous enough to set them forth. . . . The path to war is also straight, save for the switch which began with the economic stangulation of Japan in July, 1941, when it had become very likely that Hitler could not be provoked into an act of war in the Atlantic. Throughout, the architect and maestro of the bellicose design was Franklin Delano Roosevelt."

He was the "Gun" and the others readily supplied the "Ammunition." This came extensively from the "stockpile" of Bernard Baruch and Felix Frankfurter both of whom were members of the Council on Foreign Relations. This is, as I have referred to before, the invisible government of the United States, and it is they who wanted the war, not the American people.

MR. HILDER: Colonel, I'd like you to explain how the average American felt when it happened—Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill, who had maneuvered for the surprise attack at Pearl Harbor, didn't speak for English-speaking people, did THEY?

COL. DALL: Naturally, a wave of indignation and patriotic anger, at what they were told was an unprovoked and dastardly attack, initially swept over the American people. This enabled Roosevelt to get our misinformed and emotional Congress to declare war. The people were appalled at the loss of eight capital ships—sunk or seriously damaged, 188 planes destroyed, and were distraught with grief for the loss of 3303 officers and men killed, and 1272 wounded, and for their families! Soon, however, numerous people were asking how it was possible that the Commanders at Pearl Harbor-Admiral Kimmel and General Short-were so completely caught by surprise. To muffle and to side-step that pertinent, but very dangerous question, President Roosevelt was forced to divert the search for the proper answer from himself, and his Administration, and create some scapegoat!

The War Lords of Washington

Admiral Kimmel subsequently explained the diversionary plan to me, as follows: "After a few days, Justice Owen Roberts arrived at Pearl Harbor with a Commission from Washington, appointed by President Roosevelt, to investigate the situation. In effect, however, to come up with much needed 'scapegoats'-meaning, of course, General Short and myself—so that the eyes of the outraged American people could be duly directed away from Washington, and focused upon individuals (the Commanders in Hawaii) in attempted explanation of that great tragedy. Ten days after the attack, I was relieved of my Command, and, in thirty days, retired."

Naturally, I was shocked by the statements of the Admiral. But I was not surprised to learn that Felix Frankfurter of the Council on Foreign Relations played an important role in arranging for President Roosevelt to appoint Owen Roberts to make a personal report to him on Pearl Harbor. Roberts assumed the role of "hatchet man" and dutifully turned in a "usable" report, which had the approval of Felix Frankfurter. According to Max Freedman, Frankfurter was always quite impenitent about his part in arranging for Mr. Justice Roberts to make a personal report to the President on the immediate events that led to Pearl Harbor, and what happened after the attack began. He was afraid of a vindictive search for scapegoats, diverting the nation 's attention from more important tasks.... He was fearful that Roosevelt's authority might be compromised by a meddlesome Congressional Committee, as Lincoln had been in the Civil War."

I can understand Frankfurter's fear of a vindictive search being made for "scapegoats"-and that the President's authority might well be compromised by a "meddling Congress."! Justice Roberts lost no time in locating the two scapegoats. Then the Whitewash began to splash!

Concerning the Roberts' so-called "Inquiry," one can readily recall what Senator Robert Taft said, on October 7, 1944, concerning the Nuremberg Trials, when eleven German leaders were sentenced to death: (I quote Senator Taft) "The eleven who have been committed to the gallows have been guilty of making aggressive war. They are guilty because they lost. Under that theory, President Roosevelt could have been executed had the Axis won. . . . The hanging of these eleven will be a blot on the American record which we shall long regret."

Many informed Americans now agree that the Roberts Report was also a "blot." It was, however, at the time a blatant attempt at "whitewash"! It "whitewashed" President Roosevelt, his Administration, and his leading accomplices. It shamelessly put the blame on the deliberately uninformed Commanders, stationed at Pearl Harbor!

Admiral Kimmel stated to me: "The Roberts Report was a shambles, full of glaring inaccuracies to serve one purpose—to make me the 'Goat,' along with General Short; to attempt to avoid the impact of Hull's November 16, 1941 'ultimatum' to the Japanese and the studied enticements extended to them to attack us, at Pearl Harbor. . . . "

The War Lords of Washington

MR. HILDER: Were there any other formal investigations? Did any one of them finally clear Admiral Kimmel and General Short?

COL. DALL: There were eight formal Pearl Harbor Investigations, all witness to a sad proof that, during war, even in our own Republic, prejudice, self-interest, political interest, and special pleading, can block the truth and eliminate fairness. For example, the Joint Congressional Committee, in its 573 pages, tortured facts and logic in order to exonerate the Administration, and find the necessary scapegoats in the persons of Admiral Kimmel and General Short. Only its minority Report dared to criticize President Roosevelt, the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, for failing to take "quick and instant executive action" on December 6 and 7. It also criticized Stimson, Knox, Marshall, and Stark "for failure to meet their responsibilities"! "Disappointingly," according to Admiral Theobald, "even the Minority Report falls far short of a full realization of President Roosevelt's connection with the Pearl Harbor disaster."

MR. HILDER: In other words, Admiral Theobald puts the responsibility for the Pearl Harbor disaster on President Roosevelt and his Administration, and mentions that Admiral Kimmel and General Short were set up to be the victims of a frame-up?

COL. DALL: That is right! So do several responsible historians. Their verdict is that President Roosevelt, under pressure from certain high level International Financiers and Churchill, brought America into the war, at any cost, to save Britain and Soviet Russia from certain defeat at the hands of Germany and finally maneuvered Japan into firing the first shot at Pearl Harbor.

MR. HILDER: Colonel, daring to tell us the truth must have required a sense of deep obligation, as well as courage, on your part, inasmuch as the chief architect of the Pearl Harbor tragedy—for your country and for ours—was your former Father-in-law. Why do you consider it important to release these secrets of Pearl Harbor and make them widely known thirty years after that event?

COL. DALL: Mr. Hilder, I appreciate the delicacy of that particular question. I do so only because of a strong conviction that the best interests of both the Japanese and American people must—I repeat: MUST—be placed above the interest of any individual or minority group! The truth as to how President Roosevelt—the "agent" for the International Monetary Powers, maneuvered Americans into World War II, is of the utmost importance. It is most important that the average person in both nations understand the terrible lessons of that war and its cause. This knowledge will greatly help to guide us all today! Dr. Harry Elmer Barnes wrote: "The great, great crime of our age was the British plotting and launching of the war, and the American support of an entry into that war."

The shortsighted "Unconditional Surrender" concept, the planned sell-out to Stalin, at Yalta, the total disarmament of Germany and Japan, the betrayal of Poland, the Baltic and Balkan states, have not only succeeded in delivering one-third of the world into Communist tyranny, dictated by their backers, but have also exposed the remnant of the free world to a permanent Cold War with the Soviets, and the blackmailing threat of widespread nuclear destruction in a third world war. As a result, without the bulwarks of Germany in Europe, and Japan in Asia, the American taxpayer has had to spend more on armaments, annually, than any nation in the history of the world. This country has been, and is still being, pushed into fighting one disastrous bloody war after another—in Korea, in Vietnam—and forced to station troops and maintain military bases all over the world, including Germany and Japan. The leaders of the International Banking Cartel are now trying to "create" another war in the Mid-East at the expense of humanity.

The War Lords of Washington

MR. HILDER: In view of those tragic results, what induced President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill to want to plunge the world into war against Germany and to refuse to negotiate peace until both Germany and Japan were totally destroyed and disarmed?

COL. DALL: The rejection of those early negotiations for peace was a moral crime and a low political blow to satisfy the greed of international finance. Some of these could be the descendents of the illuminati. The rejection of peace suggests that the Allied motives were not by any means a noble crusade against National Socialism in Germany, but, in reality, a crafty, selfish, power play, in order to destroy an unwelcome commercial rival. As early as November, 1936, Churchill said to General Robert E. Wood of Chicago, later Chairman of the America First Committee: (Churchill) "Germany is getting too strong, and we must smash her."

I again quote Dr. Harry Elmer Barnes as follows: "This accorded with the sentiments of Churchill's great, good friend, and his chief unofficial contact in the United States, Bernard Baruch. The latter observed to General George C. Marshall in 1938: Bernard Baruch - "We are going to lick that fellow Hitler. He isn't going to get away with it." When Bernard Baruch speaks of "We," just who does he mean—the powerful European tycoons of International Finance, the Rothschild Complex, or Kuhn, Loeb & Co., the Rockefellers, the Lehman Brothers, Lazard Freres & Co., and Goldman, Sachs & Co., etc., in America? True, Bernard Baruch, as an individual, cut a mighty figure in International-Political finance. It is said that before World War I, he was worth a million dollars, and when it was over, he was worth two hundred million dollars. In World War II, he certainly conspired with Churchill and Roosevelt to bring America into it. Later, he aggressively pressured political Washington to implement Henry Morgenthau, Jr.'s plan for total disarmament and the dismantling of Christian Germany.

MR. HILDER: Was that Plan ever put into effect?

COL. DALL: Secretary Morgenthau, himself, boasts in his ghost-written book, "GERMANY IS OUR PROBLEM," in 1945, that "in the Potsdam Declaration ... the three principal Allies were seeking to carry out the objectives of that policy." (p. xii) William Henry Chamberlin in his authoritative "AMERICA'S SECOND CRUSADE," wrote that "the extremely harsh Joint Chiefs of Staff document number 1067," of the American Military Government of Germany, was "taken almost literally from the original text of the Morgenthau Plan."

MR. HILDER: Was Secretary Henry Morgenthau also interested in President Roosevelt's Japanese policy?

COL. DALL: Yes, he was. In fact, it was Morgenthau who first proposed the policy of strangling Japan, economically.

The War Lords of Washington

He was a well placed "front" for the forces that resorted to every possible means to force President Roosevelt to get America into war. But, it was his clever and devious assistant, Harry Dexter White, later exposed as a high-level Communist agent, who drafted and presented to Secretary of State Hull the outline for the ultimative ten-point note to Japan, dated November 26, 1941. Dr. Barnes writes: "Roosevelt was surrounded with Communist sympathizers and some undoubted Communists, one, a member of his official family at the White House, exerted a powerful influence on Roosevelt and Secretary Hull. Hull's ultimatum of November 26, 1941, which brought the Japanese attack at Pearl Harbor, was based in large part directly upon a memorandum handed to him by Harry Dexter White, surely a Communist agent, if not a card-carrying Communist himself."

In short, Henry Morgenthau, Jr., scion of an international banking family, and Harry Dexter White, a top-level Communist agent, also actively worked, planned, and hoped for the ultimate assault on Pearl Harbor. Both, likewise, represented the long-range aims of the major financial complexes, which benefited extensively from World War II. Incidentally, Henry's military record was most distinguished by its virtual nonexistence.

MR. HILDER: Colonel, would you, please, explain this more in detail?

COL. DALL: Certainly! That International Communism—meaning Soviet Russia— benefited, is most obvious. America incurred death, debt and destruction and Britain lost her Empire, while the Bolsheviki of Soviet Russia got half of Germany, and control over half of Europe and Asia. Furthermore, what also came out of the war was the appearance of the State of Israel and, in place of reasonable reparations to the victors, enormous West German reparations were allotted —then siphoned to Israel. By 1964, this added up to billions of dollars. Hence, Communism and Zionism have greatly profited! Huge indemnities and reparations from World War II have been arranged for the European favorites of politically powerful International banking houses. But in spite of this Japan and Germany have risen to the top in world economic output.

MR. HILDER: The benefit to Zionist objectives seems obvious, but how did the bankers finance International Communism?

COL. DALL: The able writer, Gary Allen, refers to "the five American satellites of the European Rothschild Banking interests." He states: "Most important in the group is Kuhn, Loeb and Company, whose head (Jacob Schiff) invested $20 million in financing the Russian Revolution in 1917. According to a report. . . to the State Department on March 3, 1932, Kuhn, Loeb and Company also laid out and financed the Soviet's first Five Year Plan ..."

Significantly, one member of this International banking complex, Paul Warburg, became the head of the Federal Reserve Bank's Board of Governors when it was created in 1913. The Federal Reserve bank system is privately owned and controlled.

MR. HILDER: Colonel Dall, I just read an article entitled "SECRET ISSUE" printed on March 26th of this year (1971) by the Los Angeles Herald Examiner where John Chamberlain, in his column, confirmed that another member of the Council on Foreign Relations - the late Tom

The War Lords of Washington

Dewey—ex-Governor of New York—who ran for President on the Republican ticket—also knew the real Pearl Harbor story. In this article, the writer, Chamberlain, states that he had a personal interview with Governor Dewey. He stated: "In 1944 Dewey had known that we cracked the most secret Japanese code sometime prior to Pearl Harbor, and that the White House knew more than fifteen hours before the Japanese attack that hostilities would open somewhere next day in the Pacific. . . . True enough the precise point could not be pinpointed but our forces everywhere in the Pacific could have been alerted. "

If Dewey actually shielded the Roosevelt Administration's act from the American public, is it further proof of your charge that political party affiliation means little when you're under the control of the International Banking Cartel, since both were members of the Council on Foreign Relations?

COL. DALL: That's right. The party affiliation of the International War conspirators means nothing-the results are the same-disaster for the world-if they are allowed to remain in positions of great influence. The International Bankers are in a unique position to profit from war irrespective of which side wins.

MR. HILDER: Then does that explain why America and Britain, at the start of World War II proclaimed the idealistic peace of the Atlantic Charter, but ended that war with the Unconditional Surrender conditions at Yalta and Potsdam aimed at the heart of Germany and Japan?

COL. DALL: That appears to be the case. At the end of World War I, America supported Woodrow Wilson's idealistic Fourteen Points, but, after the guns became silent, concluded it with the ominous Versailles Treaty which, "demanded reparations in the form of money which Germany could never pay." Only by exacting enormous reparations from the vanquished can those few men who financed both sides, the International Bankers, be certain to recover their original stakes, and then gain considerably more!

MR. HILDER: In World War II, weren't the International Bankers in favor of the Morgenthau Plan and huge reparations from Germany and Japan in addition to the massive territorial theft, specifically directed to Soviet Communists?

COL. DALL: Indeed they were! As previously stated: Harry Dexter White, a Communist agent, drafted the so-called Morgenthau Plan.

Friends and associates, both here and abroad, comprising what might be called the Rothschild complex, pressed for a vindictive peace which left a vacuum for Soviet Russia to self-servingly fill, where once a strong Germany had been. My friend Walter Trohan, for many years a top Washington correspondent for the CHICAGO TRIBUNE, in an article entitled: "THREE MEN CALLED A GOVERNMENT" on May 28, 1950, wrote: "A person with highest State Department connections, identified these three figures as the secret government of the United States. (Supreme Court Justice) Frankfurter . . . the most powerful man in the government, reaching into the White House with his proteges. (Governor of New York) Herbert Lehman . . . a powerful Wall Street Force . . . Henry Morgenthau, Jr. . . ."

The War Lords of Washington

All three of these men were closely associated with the complex of International Financiers, all three pressured President Roosevelt to get the United States into the war with Japan, all three demanded a vindictive peace against Germany and Japan, which largely benefited Communism and Zionism and their bankers, of course. It created the State of Israel and enabled Soviet Russia to master half of Europe and of Asia.

MR. HILDER: Aside from the Morgenthau Plan, was there any particular action aided by these men which damaged America and aided the Soviet Socialists?

COL. DALL: Yes. we must never forget that the cruel Anglo-American bombing of Dresden, an open city, was an unparalleled act of genocide merely to impress Joe Stalin. A top U.S. military authority told me personally that 385,000 men, women, and children were ruthlessly slaughtered at Dresden. Plus allowing the Soviet Communists to plunder, rape and lay siege to Berlin. Then the incredible "OPERATION" termed "KEELHAUL" delivered to Stalin's butchers over a million Russian freedom fighters for mass extermination in Soviet slave camps. They had fought with Germany against the tyrants who had dominated their country and had surrendered to the Anglo-Americans thinking they would be saved from the death camps. It was General Dwight D. Eisenhower who ordered their forceful repatriation for certain death.

Another one of the outrageous betrayals of American interests was Secretary Morgenthau's plan of giving to Soviet Russia four airplane loads of our money plates, including all accessories, such as paper and our special ink. with no strings attached. Major Racey Jordan, in his book "FROM MAJOR RACEY JORDAN'S DIARY," describes in one chapter, "How Russians Got U.S. Treasury Plates." He states: "The U.S. Treasury . . . was shipping engraving plates and other materials to Russia, so that they could print the same occupation money* for Germans as the United States was printing. . . . The sum of money which we lost in redeeming the marks which the Russians rolled off their presses, with no accountability whatever, appears to have been $250,000,000!"

The AMERICAN MERCURY. June, 1957, in an article entitled: "Spook Money Haunts U.S. Treasury," revealed: "Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Secretary of the Treasury, with Harry Dexter White, Under-Secretary, and Harold Glasser. all in charge of the U.S. Treasury, gave the Russian Government money-plates, complete with plane loads of special ink, and four plane loads of special paper for printing our occupation money in Germany, to pay two-years' salary to Russian soldiers.

MR. HILDER: If that's so, then the war was immensely profitable for the Communists, their Banker backers and their Leftist friends. Are there estimates of the amount of so-called "refugee money" that has been brought into the United States?

COL. DALL: Yes. The AMERICAN MERCURY also writes in that connection: " . . . i t is estimated the known

* Occupation money-or script was issued to servicemen in lieu of U.S. Dollars. The Russians were not given plates or paper to print U.S. Dollars.

 Refugee money is different from occupation money. Refugee money was currency and valuables displaced persons (refugees) managed to bring to the U.S.

The War Lords of Washington

movement of such money into the U.S. amounts to about $19 billion ($19,000,000,000) of which more than $3 billion came from Canada, and $1,800,000,000 through Swiss banks!"

It is said that some of this money went into acquiring stakes in numerous hotels, publishing, radio, and television companies. This will explain, in part, why most of our U.S. communications media tends to be slanted Left, and are often overly sympathetic to the aims of Fabian Socialism and International Bolshevism. For example, in the current "undeclared" Vietnam war, there is much harping on alleged South Vietnamese and American atrocities. The "managed" news media rarely mentions the massacre of nearly 100,000 innocent men, women and children by the Soviet Cong and the North Vietnamese.

As to World War II, they rarely reported the Soviet-Russian atrocities like the mass murder of 12 thousand Polish officers in the Katyn Forest Massacre where the Leftists dumped these men in one huge common grave. Yet, our "managed" media never tires of alluding to, and even enlarging upon, alleged Japanese and German atrocities. Our government worked around the clock to develop "race hatred" against the Japanese.

MR. HILDER: According to your quotation from Major Racey Jordan's DIARY, estimating that possibly 250,000,000 dollars' worth of this Morgenthau "spook money" was immediately circulated in Germany, is it not possible then that some of this, too, went to Socialists, or Red agents, to buy control of the German communications media?

COL. DALL: Yes, I am reliably informed that the occupation authorities issued special licenses, without which no media could be operated, and these, almost without exception, were granted to Socialists, Leftists, crypto-Communists. or non-ethnic Germans; never to conservative or actively anti-communistic Germans. The saturation of "spook money" from the Morgenthau plates, given to the Soviet Russians, most probably played a significant role in the acquisition and early operations of the German communications media. In the Soviet Zone. Ulbricht's sector, the Communists control all the media; in West Germany, the liberal, socialistic, and one-world elements are dominant, while an independent, conservative press is only slowly establishing itself. Radio and television programs are still more representative of "foreign," rather than German interests.

MR. HILDER: Would that explain why some financial and political circles in America were anxious to bring America into World War II, even if it had to be by the devious "backdoor" route?

COL. DALL: That is the bitter and terrible truth. What we Americans got out of the catastrophe was a huge war debt, a quarter million casualties, and the awesome realization of a possible atomic war. The same ideological set of planners who gave the money-plates to Soviet Russia also betrayed the secrets of the atom bomb to Moscow. Among them was Henry Morgenthau's assistant. Harry Dexter White, mentioned before. who. when exposed. suddenly disappeared, allegedly having died. Two accomplices. Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, on June 19. 1953. were executed as Communist spies but only after great damage had been done!

The War Lords of Washington

MR. HILDER: Is there reasonable hope that, in spite of all this, the U.S. and the Free World, including Japan, can save themselves from a Communist take-over, and will also be able, eventually, to liberate Cuba, Central and Eastern Europe, Africa and Asia, from a one-world Communist tyranny?

COL. DALL: Yes—but only with the most dedicated efforts to expose this International Banking conspiracy on a WORLD SCALE!

MR. HILDER: Is there any evidence that President Truman knew Japan was ready to surrender before he had the first atom bomb dropped on Hiroshima on August 6th, 1945. (Soviet Russia on August 8th broke its five year neutrality pact with Japan by declaring war.)

COL. DALL: It has long been known that as early as June 29, 1945, Japan approached Moscow to ask its good offices towards negotiating peace with Washington. But Stalin, hoping to get in on the loot by a last minute declaration of war on Japan, kept stalling Japanese emissaries off. But now also more and more evidence is coming to light that Japan did not rely only on Moscow but also sought contact with the U.S. on its own.

MR. HILDER: What is some of this evidence?

COL. DALL: Helmut Suendermann, the respected German author and editor of Das Morgenthau Tagebuch (The Morgenthau Journals) (Druffel Verlag. 1970). summarizes such evidence in an article entitled. "Die amerikanisch-sowjetische Japan-Verschwoerung" (The American-Soviet Conspiracy against Japan. Deutsche Wochenzeitung, August 14. 1970). In this he writes that Allan W. Dulles, also a member of the Council on Foreign Relations, had as early as May, 1945, taken up contact with Japanese intermediaries in Switzerland. On May 30. 1945. Harry Hopkins. President Truman's special emissary, telegraphed President Truman that Japan has lost and knows it. On May 28. 1945. Former President Hoover presented Truman a Memorandum urging negotiating peace with Japan. More pointedly. Joseph C. Grew, who was U.S. Ambassador to Japan, before the Pearl Harbor attack, as early as mid-May began to urge President Truman that if he assured the Japanese that Unconditional Surrender would not imperil their Emperor, they would make peace. Admiral William D. Leahy urged the same idea upon President Truman. President Truman answered with pretexts for delay. First he wanted to await the fall of Okinawa, then in Mid-June, he told Grew matters would have to wait until the Potsdam conference.

MR. HILDER: What was the situation at the start of the Potsdam Conference on July 1 7?

The War Lords of Washington

COL. DALL: This was three weeks before President Truman dropped the first atom bomb on the innocent civilian population and Soviet Russia got into the war with Japan for the spoils. We must not forget that Truman was also a member of the Council on Foreign Relations as was my father-in-law, Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Historian Suendermann reports: "In Potsdam Truman could immediately see how right all those were who urged offering Japan peace. Here the American Secret Service confirmed Tokyo's requests to Moscow in behalf of the Emperor to intercede for peace with Washington . . . Not the least doubt remained that the Japanese were ready to surrender and accept any hard conditions. One word of the President would have sufficed to end the Asian war even before the first Potsdam session began. But this word the President did not pronounce...."

Instead, he ordered the first atom bomb in history to be dropped on Hiroshima on August 6th. One day before on August 9th. he ordered the second dropped on Nagasaki, Stalin attacked Japan in the rear. One consequence of this was that the Communists got North Korea and America paid dearly, in the Korean War five years later, to prevent the Reds from getting all of Korea and possibly Japan. For many years many of us thought that President Truman was just a simple well-meaning, gutless individual who was too weak to hold his own in conferences with the Soviet Communist backers. But unfortunately, more and more evidence indicates that he deliberately wanted to build Soviet Russia, just as President Roosevelt did.

MR. HILDER: Is there more evidence?

COL. DALL: Plenty. In an article in the Santa Ana Register on August 2nd, 1969, entitled "SOILED CHAPTER OF HISTORY," this California newspaper states: "... after the German surrender in the spring of 1945, Japanese diplomats and intelligence agents, in Sweden, in Switzerland, in Portugal and in other neutral countries, were frantically trying to establish peace contacts with the U.S. Government, and that in Mid-July, 1945—before the Potsdam ultimatum to Japan—Per Jacobsson, of Sweden, reported to the late Allen Dulles, who later became CIA chief, that he was "personally convinced," after talks with Japanese diplomats that "these approaches (for peace) are serious. " Allen Dulles was also a member of our "invisible government"—the secretive Council on Foreign Relations.

MR. HILDER: Are there any other publications stating this?

COL DALL: Yes. On July 5th, 1969, the Rocky Mountain News carried an article by R. H. Shackford entitled, "PAPERS INDICATE JAPAN SOUGHT PEACE BEFORE U.S. DROPPED ATOM BOMBS." The papers he referred to are released 1945 Diplomatic Documents of the U.S. State Department on the Far East.

MR. HILDER: Are these items still suppressed?

COL. DALL: Yes, like most of the data on these atrocities, the high ranking Council on Foreign Relations officials influencing American education have "managed" an historical blackout of these crimes against humanity.

Shackford states in his article: "Long before the bombs were dropped on Japan, Japanese diplomats all over the world were trying to establish contacts to talk about peace—Pope Pius XII being the first to turn down a Japanese overture that he mediate-but that, due to a U.S. government 'hang-up' on 'unconditional surrender' all early feelers by the Japanese came to naught. " He goes on to state: "As late as 1945, four months after Japan's surrender, acting Secretary of State, Dean Acheson (who was a member of the Council on Foreign Relations) categorically denied in a published letter to a Congressman that the U.S. had received any "official" Japanese peace offers earlier in the year."

The War Lords of Washington

MR. HILDER: Then you mean the Japanese government was even willing to accept unconditional surrender before Hiroshima and Nagasaki?

COL. DALL: Exactly. The American Historian Dr. Harry Elmer Barnes says that by January 1945 the Japanese were convinced that they had lost the war and had sent peace overtures to General MacArthur which were almost identical to the final settlement. MacArthur urged Roosevelt to start immediate negotiations, but to exclude the Russians. The President rejected MacArthur's humane and patriotic suggestions.

Barnes got the story from my friend the American Newsmen, Walter Trohan, who exposed the whole foul treachery on the Sunday after V-J Day, August 19, 1945. Trohan got the story and the facts directly from Admiral Leahy, over whose desk passed the communications between my former father-in-law and General MacArthur. The story was personally confirmed by ex-President Herbert Hoover in 1951, who asked MacArthur if it was true. MacArthur confirmed it in every detail. Recently, the story was again revealed in The American Mercury magazine, its Fall, 1970, issue.

MR. HILDER: President Truman stated: "The need for such a fateful decision (the atomic bombing) of course, would never have arisen had we not been shot in the back by Japan at Pearl Harbor in December 1941," This was his justification for Hiroshima and Nagasaki. . . . How do you judge President Truman's attitude?

COL. DALL: Much the same as Hiroshima's City Council. They put it very well, and I quote: "Had your decision been based on the Imperial Japanese Navy's surprise attack on your country's combatants and military facilities (at Pearl Harbor) "why could you not choose a military base for the target? You committed the outrage of massacring 200,000 noncombatants as revenge, and you are still trying to justify it."

MR. HILDER: Wasn't President Nixon also a member of the Council on Foreign Relations as well as General Eisenhower, who ordered General Patton to hold back so the Soviet troops could plunder Berlin?

COL. DALL: That is a most important point considering Nixon's flirtation with Red China. It is said that Nixon has over seventy members of the Council on Foreign Relations in his administration. Nixon ignores the fact that Red China has exterminated 66,400,000 of its own people in mass genocide. This is the largest massacre of human beings in the history of the world and is documented by the Free Chinese Government in Taiwan. Nixon ignores the fact that the Communists still have our prisoners of war from Korea enslaved. Nixon further ignores the fact that all of Eastern Europe is still enslaved and the Soviets have murdered in death camps and starved upwards of 45 million additional people since the "one world" Bankers brought them to power in 1917.

The War Lords of Washington

MR. HILDER: Why did these International Cartelists wish to mass murder innocent men, women and babies after the war was virtually over?

COL. DALL: For several reasons: First, the International Financial Powers that caused the war were determined to completely crush Japan and Germany so they could take over the gigantic industries of these two great nations. That evidence is very clear. The Japanese people should take a very close look today at the foreign ownership of some of its largest companies in international trade and shipping. I repeat- a very close look. Secondly, I believe it was to panic the nations of the world into accepting a one-world super-government, allegedly to end all wars. The "One World" money powers, operating through the United Nations (a major promotion of the Council on Foreign Relations) foisted the idea that the bomb could kill everyone (like in Hiroshima and Nagasaki) if they didn't bow to their self-serving demands.

MR. HILDER: And one last question—How do you feel about the U.N.?

COL. DALL: I believe the U.N. is most dangerous to the freedom of the world and to individual liberty. In fact it is more dangerous than atomic bombs and must be scrapped.

The War Lords of Washington

COLONEL DALL'S CLOSING

The birth of world peace will be heralded only by the death of world government. The International Banking Cartelists and their agents, operating through the Council on Foreign Relations in the United States and the Royal Institute of International Affairs in England and other such organizations throughout the world profit from poverty and the slaughter of much of the earth's peace-loving population. For freedom to rise, they must fall. The war was brought about by their design—not by the peoples of Japan and the United States, but by a small group of wealthy men who controlled the governments of our nations. We can gain and attain peace only when we are mentally, physically and spiritually armed against, the power of the international bankers and their agents who profit by creating war. We must prepare to win or prepare to die.

Only by disclosing the secrets behind the last war, with your help and dedicated efforts, can we prevent a future war. I ask now that we join hands for the preservation of mankind.

ROOSEVELT IS FRUSTRATED IN EUROPE

by

FREDERIC R. SANBORN

No matter how well we are supported by neutrality legislation, we must remember that no laws can be provided to cover every contingency, for it is impossible to imagine how every future event may shape itself. In spite of every possible forethought, international relations involve of necessity a vast uncharted area. In that area safe sailing will depend on the knowledge and the experience and the wisdom of those who direct our foreign policy. Peace will depend on their day-to-day decisions.

At this late date, with the wisdom which is so easy after the event and so difficult before the event, we find it possible to trace the tragic series of small decisions which led Europe into the Great War in 1914 and eventually engulfed us and many other nations.

We can keep out of war if those who watch and decide have a sufficiently detailed understanding of international affairs to make certain that the small decisions of each day do not lead toward war, and if, at the same time, they possess the courage to say "No" to those who selfishly or unwisely would let us go to war.

—FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT, speech at Chautauqua, New York, August 14, 1936.

Governments . . . do not always take rational decisions. Sometimes they take mad decisions, or one set of people get control who compel all others to obey and aid them in folly.

—WINSTON S. CHURCHILL, The Grand Alliance, p. 603.

Frederic R. Sanborn was born on February 14, 1899. He received the A.B. degree with high honors from Columbia University in 1919. Two years later he was awarded the degree of A.M., with a major in international law and diplomacy, by Columbia University, and the degree of LL.B. by the Columbia University Law School in the same year. While at Columbia, he studied international law and diplomacy under the leading American authority in the field, John Bassett Moore. He then went to England for further study at Oxford University, where he specialized in legal history and international law under the guidance of the eminent legal historian, Sir William Holdsworth. He received his Ph.D. degree in law from Oxford in 1924. Even before he finished his legal studies at Oxford he was awarded a Carnegie Fellowship in International Law in 1923 for further study and research at the Sorbonne. But he declined this grant in order to return to New York and establish his law practice. He is now a member of Putney, Twombly, Hall & Skidmore, one of the oldest law firms in New York City.

In addition to his increasingly important law practice, Dr. Sanborn taught law in the postgraduate department of the Brooklyn Law School of St. Lawrence University from 1927 to 1938, and international law in the postgraduate department of St. John's University School of Law from 1928 to 1930.

Dr. Sanborn's interest in international law and diplomacy led him to prepare his book on the Origins of the Early English Maritime and Commercial Law, sponsored by the American Historical Association and published by The Century Company in 1930, and his important analytical volume, Design for War ; A Study of Secret Power Politics, 1937-1941, published by the Devin-Adair Company in 1951. The latter is one of the most important books yet to appear on the diplomacy which led the United States into war in December, 1941. It is characterized by both careful scholarship and commendable restraint in statements and generalizations. It will remain one of the impressive monuments of American historiography following the second World War.

I. INTRODUCTORY CONSIDERATIONS AND HYPOTHESES : THE ABANDONMENT OF AMERICAN NEUTRALITY

It is difficult to rise from a contemplative study of the history of American power politics during the last fifteen years without experiencing a profound feeling of melancholy. When one has meditated upon the myriads of deaths, the human suffering, the destruction, the waste—human, economic, and of opportunity—which have ensued from the decisions erroneously made by those who were in power during those tragic years, and when one contemplates the bleak vistas which now lie before all of us as the remorseless consequence of those erroneous decisions, one is tempted to echo the epitome of the Roman emperors—nihil non commiserunt stupri, saevitiae, impietatis.

Mr. Roosevelt's share in making those decisions was considerable, and, so far as the people of the United States were concerned, it was preponderant. Many of Mr. Roosevelt's acts and negotiations were secret, sometimes so secret that even the Secretary of State was not informed about them,\(1\) and in consequence Mr. Roosevelt acted for the most part without consultation or counselling from others. His policies were therefore very largely personal, and his adulators were at least true in their aim when they praised him for the authorship of the policies which were nominally called American.

And so, similarly, now that the time has come to take an audit of the great balance sheet of history, the debits must stand largely against the same man to whom the credits were once awarded.

Largely, but not entirely, for a reason which requires some brief elaboration. Like almost every one else, Mr. Roosevelt was the child of his own times, and of the Zeitgeist. In consequence of this we must refer to certain misdirected developments in the sphere of international law in the late twenties and in the thirties. A natural revulsion against war had followed the first World War, and this feeling was partly expressed in the Kellogg-Briand Treaty of Paris by which war was renounced by many nations as an instrument of national policy. The collateral concept of collective security found sincere advocates, and there developed along with it the concept of an aggressor nation. In this discussion space does not permit the elaborating upon or the criticizing of these concepts, but one must add that as their natural consequence it was urged by a considerable number of domestic writers and teachers that the traditional cornerstone of American foreign policy, the doctrine of neutrality, had now become obsolete ; it was ignoble and should be abandoned in favor of collective warfare against an aggressor. Such views did not lack able criticism, but, notwithstanding, they prevailed in quantity, if not in quality, in certain academic and other spheres. They were the academic ancestors of what later was called interventionism, and it seems not unlikely that they contributed to weakening Mr. Roosevelt's waning belief in neutrality.

Notwithstanding these palliatory observations it still remains true that the credit or the blame for American power politics must remain largely with Mr. Roosevelt. As the years have passed by, and as the unfortunate results of his policies have become too visibly apparent either to be denied or concealed, the defenders of the wisdom of his policies have been compelled to shift over from unqualified praise to mildly critical apology. And in going over to the defensive there has been an interesting shift in the position of their battle lines.

Their first line of defense has always rested and still rests upon a foundation blended of faith, emotion, and hypothesis.

The justification of Mr. Roosevelt's admittedly unneutral policy toward Germany which was originally offered for public consumption was to claim the necessity of self-defense against an almost immediately anticipated attack. But when the immediately anticipated attack did not eventuate, a more satisfactory and more indefinite hypothesis became requisite. Some sincere but uninformed people have faith in the revised justification to this very day.

The revised hypothesis was amplified into a claim of the necessity of an anticipatory self-defense, and it had variant versions as propounded at different times. In one form the story ran that Hitlerite Germany was planning to attack the United States in a military way at some unspecified future date. In another variant the military attack was to be made by a conspiratorial combination of Fascist nations⁽²⁾ after they had first conquered the rest of the world. In yet another variant the attack was not to be military at all, but rather a kind of economic strangulation of America by embargo or boycott.

The variants of this second justification were more useful, propagandawise, than was the first hypothesis. The new hypotheses were more indefinite ; they ranged more widely in futurity, and they aroused more emotional response in those who believed in them on faith.

Looking as they did to a far more distant future these revised hypotheses were quite incapable of contemporaneous disproof. Consequently it was impossible for skeptics to contest them at the time of utterance, and therefore Mr. Roosevelt's intended course of action could not be prevented or hindered by any rational argument based upon known facts. Moreover there was always the happy chance, from Mr. Roosevelt's point of view, that even though such hypothetical justifications were not true when made, they might come true at some later date in consequence of his repeated unneutral and hostile activities.

With the passage of the years the texture of these widely propagandized fears is seen to be a shabby fustian. Tons and tons—quite literally—of the German archives, and of their top-secret plans, memoranda, and correspondence fell into the hands of the victors at the end of the war. These documents were winnowed and studied with care for months and months by dozens of investigators in a meticulous search for every shred of evidence which could be presented at the Nuremberg trials. After a lengthy and minute ransacking it transpired that nowhere in these papers was there to be found any evidence of any German plans to attack the United States. Quite to the contrary, the embarrassing fact developed from the secret papers that for many months prior to Pearl Harbor Chancellor Hitler was doing all that he could to avoid conflict with the United States !

This incontrovertible fact has shaken the faith of some, although not all, of the true believers. The more rational amongst those whose faith in the old hypotheses has diminished have now evolved a new hypothesis, that America could not have stood by as a passive neutral, and let Britain, France, and much of Western Europe fall into the power of Nazi tyrants. This new hypothesis is emotionally seductive, like the abandoned hypotheses, and from the viewpoint of its propounders it has the merit of excessive oversimplification.

Merely in order to list a few of these oversimplifications, one might ask (1) To what extent did Mr. Roosevelt overurge Britain or France to adopt various courses of conduct which would tend to war ? (2) To what extent did Mr. Roosevelt's own maladroit diplomacy contribute to avoidable participation in the war by certain countries ? (3) Did Mr. Roosevelt have in mind only limited political objectives, which could have been more swiftly attained, such as the downfall of the Nazi government, or vaster objectives requiring a prolonged war, such as the total destruction of Germany ? (4) Did not Mr. Roosevelt overestimate the danger to Western Europe to be anticipated from Fascist tyranny, while underestimating the potential menace of Communist tyranny ? (5) In this connection, how accurate—or inaccurate—was Mr. Roosevelt's estimate of the probability of a conflict in the near future between tyrant and tyrant, Hitler versus Stalin, in which the evil power of both might have been sapped ? Many similar questions will occur to the informed reader as he considers the shortcomings of the last hypothesis. But perhaps the most potent objection to this hypothesis is one which could be validly posed to the conduct of much of our power politics of recent years : Mr. Roosevelt's policy was based upon a supposed friendship, and not upon the national interest of America. In power politics there are no friendships ; there are only interests. Much American disillusionment has arisen and will continue to arise from ignorance or disregard of such an elementary principle. George Washington said, in his Farewell Address to the people of the United States :

Observe good faith and justice towards all Nations ; Cultivate peace and harmony with all. . .

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations, and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded ; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The Nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. . . . The peace often . . . of Nations has been the victim.

. . . Sympathy for the favorite Nations, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducement or justification. . . .

But Mr. Roosevelt, and also Mr. Hull,\(3\) consistently violated these true and simple precepts which had been expressed for many decades in the traditional American policy of neutrality. Instead, Mr. Roosevelt elected to play the game of secret politics in our foreign affairs. “The wisdom of any foreign policy can generally be determined only by its results.”\(4\) judged by this canon Mr. Roosevelt’s foreign policy was not successful, and if this much is acknowledged then even the latest apology of his defenders fails.

Indeed, one is tempted to ask, how could the traditional American policy of neutrality have produced results which could have been any worse ?

In 1914 Mr. Wilson had appealed to all Americans for neutrality even in their personal thoughts, uttering “. . . a solemn word of warning . . . against that deepest, most subtle, most essential breach of neutrality which might spring out of partisanship, out of passionately taking sides.”\(5\) Whatever Mr. Wilson did later, his appeal was in the highest tradition of George Washington and of the established pattern of American diplomacy. Mr. Roosevelt knew what neutrality was, “in the highest sense—not to help one fellow more than the other.”\(6\) But Mr. Roosevelt issued no Wilsonian appeal to the American people, perhaps because he felt that it was unnecessary. Many months later he acknowledged this fact : “There can be no question that the people of the United States in 1939 were determined to remain neutral in fact and in deed. . . .”(7) Right up to Pearl Harbor this sentiment of the American people themselves did not change, as one of Mr. Roosevelt’s recent apologists has acknowledged : “. . . It was the first war in American history in which the general disillusionment preceded the firing of the first shot. It has been called, from the American point of view, ‘the most unpopular war in history.’ . . .”(8) And the apologist then offers his own brief theory as to why this feeling existed. It would seem more probable that the “general disillusionment” of which he speaks was due to quite different causes.

As a whole, the American people had never accepted the new scholastic theory of more or less “collective” warfare against an alleged aggressor. Perhaps the people’s intuitive common sense had already suggested to them that in any future “collective” action the other nations would expect America to assume almost the entire burden involved. Perhaps they esteemed the wise advice of George Washington more highly than the new theory. But apart from such conjectures it is clear that they believed in our established policy of neutrality. Semantic propagandists have tried to belittle that doctrine by calling it what they hoped would be a smearing name—“isolationism.” Name calling is not intelligent or rational and this device of propaganda did not deceive the majority of the American people who continued to be “isolationist” in their desire to remain neutral and to live in peace, as every poll of public opinion conclusively showed. Their “general disillusionment” was, in fact, due to their ultimate realization that Mr. Roosevelt in some unperceived way, and at some unknown time, had abandoned his professed policies of neutrality and peace and had secretly adopted a design for war.

The turning point is probably to be found in the “quarantine the aggressors” speech which Mr. Roosevelt delivered at Chicago on October 5, 1937.(9) Prior to that time Mr. Roosevelt’s public declarations had been very clearly isolationist.(10) After that time a change becomes apparent. But at the outset Mr. Roosevelt apparently contemplated only action which would have aided China against Japan,\(11\) rather than any intervention in Europe.

Yet the one ultimately led to the other. In the aftermath of the Chicago speech Mr. Roosevelt found himself in closer touch with high British personalities,\(12\) and these relationships continued to develop rather quickly, with the British naturally being more interested in the affairs of Europe, into a policy of active although unacknowledged co-operation with Britain which was in effect before January, 1938.\(13\) It was in December, 1937, that Admiral Royal E. Ingersoll, then director of the Navy's War Plans Division, was sent to Britain by Mr. Roosevelt to discuss possible Anglo-American cooperation in case of war.\(14\) Out of these meetings some kind of an understanding or agreement developed. It was also in 1937 that the studies were commenced for the highly secret Industrial Mobilization Plan,\(15\) which contemplated that no less than twenty thousand factories should be earmarked for the production of war materials. Space hardly permits a detailed narration of the further steps which commenced in 1938 and looked toward the preparation in quantities of the necessary war materials. Likewise, only brief mention can be made of Mr. Roosevelt's political maneuvers, ultimately successful, but only by a narrow margin,\(16\) to oppose Congressman Louis Ludlow's proposal that there should be a national referendum vote as a prerequisite to a declaration of war.

Immediately after the German annexation of Austria, Mr. Hull\(17\) made a speech on March 17, 1938, in which he advocated "collaboration" along "parallel lines" in order to prevent the spread of the "contagious scourge of treaty breaking and armed violence." These propaganda efforts were continued during the spring and summer by Mr. Roosevelt and by others. By April, 1938, Mr. Emil Ludwig, whose biography of Mr. Roosevelt was almost official, knew enough about his plans to be able to state that, if there was a war in Europe, America "would probably supply the European democracies with everything except troops."\(18\)

In late June, 1938, Mr. Roosevelt publicly announced⁽¹⁹⁾ that the Navy, long concentrated in the Pacific, would in due course be concentrated in the Atlantic. In August secret negotiations, which have never been sufficiently investigated, were commenced with British representatives. For public consumption it was stated on November 17, 1938, that only trade agreements were being signed, but there were many hints cast out of underlying and unrevealed political commitments.⁽²⁰⁾ It seems certain that by that time Mr. Roosevelt and his associates were already secretly deep in the power politics of Europe, and a showdown had come earlier than they had anticipated, because of the events which culminated at Munich on September 30, 1938.

In early August even minor British officials knew that “at present Great Britain can count on close co-operation with [the] United States.”⁽²¹⁾ The American naval attaché at Lisbon, said to be a personal friend of Mr. Roosevelt, stated at that time that the possibilities for speedy aid to Great Britain and France were being studied in America, and that this aid would include many airplanes.⁽²²⁾ Evidently there had been some diplomatic leakage as to this information, because on September 9, 1938, Mr. Roosevelt found it necessary to deny that the United States was allied with European powers in a stop-Hitler movement.⁽²³⁾ It is interesting to speculate upon his reasons for omitting his denial from his published papers at a later date.

II. ROOSEVELT AND MUNICH

And now it becomes necessary to narrate the melancholy story of Munich. Even among historians it does not seem to be generally known that Mr. Roosevelt must bear a portion of the responsibility which has been attributed entirely but erroneously to Mr. Chamberlain. When the summer of 1938 began, Chancellor Hitler was preparing to press new demands upon Czechoslovakia, but he was careful to note that he intended to avoid war : “ However, I will decide to take action against Czechoslovakia only if I am firmly convinced as in the case of the occupation of the demilitarized zone and the entry into Austria that France will not march and therefore England will not intervene.”\(24\)

As the situation became intensified in late August, Mr. Churchill, although not in office, wrote to Lord Halifax\(25\) and suggested that Britain, France, and Russia should address a joint note to Germany intimating that an invasion of Czechoslovakia “would raise capital issues for all three powers.” And Mr. Churchill also advised that Mr. Roosevelt should be induced “to do his utmost” in approaching Chancellor Hitler only, and in urging upon him a friendly settlement. In the outcome, the only deviation from Mr. Churchill’s plan was in its last item.

As September lengthened the situation became more acute, but on the whole the tendency was for Britain, France, and Russia to stand more firmly together. On September 12, 1938, Foreign Minister Bonnet repeated the latter part of Mr. Churchill’s suggestions, and urged that Ambassador Wilson at Berlin be instructed to make representations to Germany only.\(26\) Mr. Chamberlain had gone to see the German Chancellor on September 15 at Berchtesgaden and again on September 22 at Godesberg, but his tendency, and that of the British cabinet, toward appeasement after the first interview was checked by the more exorbitant demands made at the second meeting.

On the night of September 23, 1938, general mobilization was ordered in Czechoslovakia, and the next day Prague informed London that the German demands were absolutely and unconditionally unacceptable. On September 24 Ambassador Kennedy telephoned from London to Mr. Hull. He reported that while the British cabinet was split, some of its members were of the opinion that Britain would have to fight.\(27\) On September 25 the American Minister to Prague telegraphed Mr. Hull a request from President Benes to Mr. Roosevelt that he should urge Britain and France not to desert Czechoslovakia.\(28\) Meanwhile France was at last preparing to perform its treaty obligations to Czechoslovakia, and partial mobilization was ordered.(29) Similarly Britain, on September 26, had announced its decision to assist France if France would stand by Czechoslovakia, and the mobilization of the British fleet was ordered on September 27 for the following day. Russia notified Prague(30) that she would honor the obligations of the 1935 treaty, and arranged with Rumania (which, with Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia, formed the Little Entente) for the passage of her troops. Russia had already delivered three hundred war planes to Czechoslovakia,(31) and in addition several squadrons of Soviet planes were on the Czechoslovak airfields.(32) In consequence Lord Halifax, still on September 26, 1938, issued this statement : “If, in spite of the efforts made by the British Prime Minister, a German attack is made upon Czechoslovakia, the immediate result must be that France will be bound to come to her assistance, and Great Britain and Russia will certainly stand by France.”(33)

Here was a momentary climax of power. It was a turning point of history, for there was bitter controversy in the opposite camp. The German people were at this moment, September 27, 1938, devoid of enthusiasm either for Chancellor Hitler or for the prospective conflict.(34) The German generals were convinced that Germany would be defeated and were preparing a Putsch(35) to depose Chancellor Hitler. The Chancellor wavered and, on the night of the twenty-seventh/twenty-eighth, the German radio broadcast an official denial that Germany intended to mobilize. Later, on the morning of the twenty-eighth, a similar statement was issued by the official German news agency.(36) The era of appeasement had apparently ended, and it seemed as if Great Britain, France, Czechoslovakia, and Russia had called Chancellor Hitler’s bluff just in the nick of time.

At this critical moment Mr. Roosevelt intervened and wrecked the entire situation. For some time he had been eager “to make personal appeals to the heads of the European Governments concerned.” There had been a conflict in the State Department : “Welles kept pushing the President on, while I [Mr. Hull] kept advising him to go Slow.”\(37\) Mr. Roosevelt decided to go ahead, and on September 26, 1938, he sent identical messages not only to Chancellor Hitler, but also to the President of Czechoslovakia, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, and to the Premier of France, asking that the negotiations might continue to settle the questions at issue, and that war might be avoided. The inner meaning of Mr. Roosevelt’s intervention could not have been misunderstood by any informed person. Mr. Roosevelt had earlier been requested to apply his pressure only against Germany, but now he was applying it against Germany’s opponents too. It was thus clear that Mr. Roosevelt was not only opposing their military preparations to go to war against Germany : he was also lending the support of his influence to those who, in the divided counsels of the British and French governments, were opposed to war—to those who have since been called the appeasers.

After all, there was nothing to negotiate except Chancellor Hitler’s demand for Czechoslovakian territory, for no country was then demanding any territory from Germany. The military preparations of Czechoslovakia, which Mr. Roosevelt’s message equated with those of Germany, were purely defensive, so that this was hardly quarantining the aggressor.

Mr. Roosevelt possessed the power as President to declare American neutrality, and by embargoing the shipment of munitions of war to both belligerents to deny them the aid of America’s vast productive and financial power. Even If Britain and France had not been divided in their counsels they would hardly have dared to antagonize Mr. Roosevelt under such critical circumstances. Quite unexpectedly the appeasers found themselves in the drivers’ seat, and Chancellor Hitler’s bluff gained an unanticipated supporter. Messrs. Chamberlain, Daladier, and Benes cabled back “their complete accord with the President’s views and their willingness to negotiate for peace” on September 26, 1938.\(38\) Mr. Chamberlain’s request to broadcast a message—no doubt of explanation—to the American people on the following night, September 27, 1938 was denied by Mr. Roosevelt.(39)

Nor was this all. Chancellor Hitler's reply, which was received in America on the night of September 26, was inconclusive. Consequently, Mr. Roosevelt thought it expedient to find additional support for his proposal. Circular instructions were therefore sent on September 27 to American diplomats in other countries, requesting them to ask the governments to which they were accredited "to send comparable appeals to Germany and Czechoslovakia"(40) (emphasis supplied); nineteen other governments (seventeen being in Latin America) obliged. Also on September 27 Mr. Roosevelt besought Premier Mussolini to urge the use of negotiations, and to Chancellor Hitler Mr. Roosevelt sent a further message urging that a conference be called. So the stage was inescapably set for Munich by Mr. Roosevelt's personal actions and maneuvers, and Mr. Chamberlain received a full award of general opprobrium in which, if justified, Mr. Roosevelt deserved a considerable share.

Mr. Roosevelt's reasons for this grievous blunder must remain conjectural until all of the secret diplomatic discussions and approaches are revealed. Meanwhile we have some clues, all of which point in the same direction, namely, that Mr. Roosevelt did not regard Munich as any final settlement with Hitler but believed that it might lead to war at no distant period. Hence, he continued his plans for a vast armament program, with emphasis on airplanes, which would help to provide Britain and France with the sinews of war and make the United States ready for possible involvement in the impending struggle.

Colonel Charles Lindbergh had reported before September 24, 1938, both to our State Department and to the British, that Germany was easily capable of combating the combined air force of all other European countries.(41) Ambassador Kennedy had not been too confident as to whether the French and the British were in good shape to fight.(42) Most revealing is the account given by General Arnold.(43) On came straight out for air power. Airplanes—now—and lots of them ! . . . A new regiment of field artillery . . . he said sharply, would not scare Hitler one blankety-blank-blank bit ! What he wanted was airplanes ! Airplanes were the war implements that would have an influence on Hitler’s activities !

September 28, 1938, Mr. Roosevelt called a meeting, which “was plainly a bolt from the blue,” to discuss aircraft production and air power in general. Mr. Roosevelt

The total air power of Britain, France, Germany, and Italy was estimated, and Mr. Roosevelt said that he wanted to create the capacity to manufacture 20,000 military planes a year, with the actual production of 10,000 planes (the approximate estimated combined total strength of Germany and Italy) a year as the immediate goal. The tremendous expansion of the Air Corps made General Arnold feel that it had “achieved its Magna Carta.” It was not wholly unexpected to him ; about a fortnight earlier Mr. Roosevelt had sent Mr. Hopkins to make a secret survey of our capacity to build military aircraft because Mr. Roosevelt “was sure then that we were going to get into war and he believed that air power would win it.”\(44\) As something of a by-product of this activity General Marshall was secretly supplied with diverted relief funds in order to procure machinery to manufacture ammunition.\(45\)

Another important clue is that in 1940 Mr. Kennedy delivered a speech in which he stated that “if Mr. Chamberlain had had five thousand first-line planes at home when he conferred at Munich we would have truly seen ‘peace in our time.’ ”\(46\)

All of this procedure makes it evident that Mr. Roosevelt did not believe that the Munich settlement meant permanent peace or even “peace in our time,” but apparently was convinced that it would lead to war in the not distant future.

All of these clues lead in the same direction, and unless and until they are superseded by better evidence their implication would seem clear. Mr. Roosevelt apparently believed, in the autumn of 1938, that the air power of Britain and France was dangerously insufficient, and that those nations ought not to assume the risks of war with Germany at that time. In consequence he intervened at a critical moment in a delicate and almost balanced situation. The result of his intervention was tantamount to compelling the Allies to agree to grant Chancellor Hitler's demands, instead of resisting them by war.

Mr. Roosevelt's intervention was therefore equivalent in its result to appeasement, so that, in the phraseology current in those times, Mr. Roosevelt was, in effect, the most decisive appeaser.*

* EDITOR'S NOTE.—As is evident from the closing paragraphs of Professor Tansill's preceding chapter, Dr. Sanborn's interpretation of President Roosevelt's motives for appeasement in the Munich crisis is open to serious challenge. To imply that Mr. Roosevelt could have believed that France and Britain were in better condition to battle against Hitler in August, 1939, than in September, 1938, is veritably to charge him with incredible ignorance, if not sheer mental defect. With the Russian and Czech armies ready to aid France and Britain in September, 1938, it is unthinkable that an attack by these four powers on Germany in the fall of 1938 would not have resulted in a quick and crushing defeat of Germany. As Langer and Gleason point out, as late as September, 1939, Hitler had available for the attack on Poland only three partly mechanized divisions and not one fully motorized division. One liberal journalist, much in personal favor with Mr. Roosevelt in 1938, even ventured the opinion at the time of Munich that the Czech army alone could defeat Hitler. Now we know that France and Britain, combined, had more tanks and war planes than Hitler possessed in September, 1938. Mr. Roosevelt must have known this at the time unless guilty of near-criminal neglect and incompetence.

The only explanation for Mr. Roosevelt's intervention in the Munich episode which would seem to accord with facts, logic, and reason is that he felt that a military attack on Hitler in September, 1938, would lead to so rapid a termination of the war (in the defeat of Germany) that he would not have time to involve this country in the great conflict. By the end of August, 1939, with the Czech army immobilized and Russia aligned with Germany, it looked like a long war, well suited to Mr. Roosevelt's interventionist program. We now know that the powerful German generals opposed to Hitler had given top-level British statesmen and diplomats definite and reliable information before the Munich crisis that an army revolt would take place in Germany against Hitler if he risked war in the autumn of 1938.

Having submitted this rejoinder, the editor re-emphasizes his respect for Dr. Sanborn as a conscientious and learned scholar. His views should be stated without restraint and are entitled to respect. In any event, Dr. Sanborn, Professor Tansill, and the editor are in full agreement upon the main point, namely, that President Roosevelt exercised a decisive influence in leading Britain and France to appease rather than forcibly to resist Hitler at the time of the Munich crisis.

III. THE AFTERMATH OF MUNICH

This intervention was, of course, not neutrality. It was also a resounding defeat in the sphere of power politics, and Mr. Roosevelt was never a man to forgive or forget such a defeat. It was not long before he began to attempt to move forward once more against Chancellor Hitler.

By mid-November, 1938, both the American ambassador to Germany and the German ambassador to the United States had been recalled. The feelings of officials in Washington were rising portentously high against Germany : it was like 1916–17.\(47\) Ambassadors Bullitt, Kennedy, and Phillips were also brought back from their posts for post-mortem conferences, and it was secretly agreed that the time had come to stop Germany and to assist Britain and France.\(48\) Mr. Morgenthau now managed to intrude himself into the military aircraft production program and commenced making the arrangements to give away our newest aircraft to foreign countries. Early in December, 1938, a French mission came secretly to the United States in order to inspect our newest attack bomber, and Mr. Morgenthau arranged for the necessary clearances.\(49\)

The secrets of power politics are rarely hidden for long from the insiders. It is only the people themselves who are not permitted to know what is being secretly planned and what is secretly done. Word of the American plans no doubt percolated through to Premier Mussolini in due course, and at the commencement of 1939 his thinking changed ; he then considered that a clash with the Western democracies was inevitable, and he decided to try to transform the Anti-Comintern agreement into an alliance.\(50\) The “American lack of political sense”\(51\) in international affairs may well have affected that fateful decision.

In a chapter limited by space we cannot pause to trace the development of Mr. Roosevelt’s propaganda in his “methods short of war” annual message to the Congress on January 4, 1939, or in his special message on defense in early January, 1939. But the trend of his thinking at this time is clear. On January 23, 1939, a bomber crashed and an injured member of the French mission was pulled from the flaming wreck.\(52\) This suddenly revealed to the American public the presence of secret military missions. In the ensuing furore Mr. Roosevelt called the Senate Military Affairs Committee to the White House, swore them to secrecy, and said that our frontier in the battle of the democracies against Fascism was on the Rhine,\(53\) or (according to another version) in France.\(54\) This, too, leaked, and the furore became greater.

The percipient reader will have noted already that while Mr. Roosevelt referred to Fascism he made no mention of the peril of Communism.

That obvious omission was contemporaneously noted by the Polish ambassador to the United States in a dispatch which showed brilliant insight upon that particular topic. On January 16, 1939, the Polish ambassador reported to Warsaw that he had had a long talk with Ambassador Bullitt, who was about to return to his post in Paris. Mr. Bullitt stated that Mr. Roosevelt's policies included rearmament "at an accelerated speed"; "that France and Britain must put [an] end to any sort of compromise with the totalitarian countries," and that "They have the moral assurance that the United States will leave the policy of isolation and be prepared to intervene actively on the side of Britain and France in case of war. America is ready to place its whole wealth of money and raw materials at their disposal." \(55\)

Several weeks later the Polish ambassador to France reported as to another conversation with Mr. Bullitt, from which he concluded "... that the policy of President Roosevelt will henceforth take the course of supporting France's resistance, to check German-Italian pressure, and to weaken British compromise tendencies." \(56\)

On March 14, 1939, Chancellor Hitler had called in the Czechoslovak President and Foreign Minister and had forced them to agree to a German protectorate and to occupation by German troops. This came as a great surprise : even Mussolini did not know it had been planned. It left him feeling flat-footed and ridiculous, \(57\) and in consequence he determined to seize Albania. Apparently American diplomats were unaware of this strained relationship between Hitler and Mussolini, and instead of capitalizing upon such divergencies they maladroitly brought the parties together by scolding messages \(58\) and by attempts to constitute a "democratic bloc." \(59\)

From Paris Mr. Bullitt wrote to Mr. Roosevelt on March 23, 1939, \(60\) urging that "some nation in Europe" should stand up to Germany "quickly," and the next day he had a conversation with the Polish ambassador. The Pole expressed the opinion, among others, that British foreign policy was "... not only concerned with the defense of these states which find themselves menaced by the new methods of German policy, but also with an ideological conflict with Hitlerism, and that the ultimate aim in the pursuit of its actions is not peace but to bring about the downfall of Germany.”(61) The Pole also objected that neither Britain nor France were taking sufficiently firm military measures at that time, and that in consequence their proposals to Poland were highly dangerous to that country. Mr. Bullitt then inquired whether Poland “would accept a common alliance in the event that France and England proposed it.” The Polish ambassador replied guardedly and in substance that it would depend upon how much power Britain was prepared to use to back up the guarantee.

Mr. Bullitt then telephoned Mr. Kennedy at London on March 25, 1939,(62) and instructed him to call on Mr. Chamberlain and repeat the conversation. Ambassador Kennedy did so on March 26, 1939,(63) and telephoned his report to Mr. Bullitt at Paris. The Polish ambassador at Paris expressed doubt as to how far Britain would go and expressed to Mr. Bullitt the “. . . hope that the United States possesses means by which it can exercise efficacious pressure on England. He added that he would seriously consider assembling these means.” Someone—we may assume that it was Mr. Bullitt—was telephoning to Mr. Roosevelt at this time,(64) and the upshot of all this maneuvering was that, on March 31, 1939, Mr. Chamberlain stated to the House of Commons that Great Britain and France would fight if Germany invaded Poland. Some light is cast upon this decision by the contemporary report of the Polish ambassador in London as to Mr. Kennedy’s conversation with Mr. Chamberlain. Mr. Kennedy, it was said, “. . . emphasized that America’s sympathies for England in case of a conflict would depend to a great extent upon the determination with which England would take care of European states threatened by Germany.”(65)

Meanwhile, in late March, Lord Halifax had approached Mr. Kennedy, saying that the British commitments in Europe were so substantial that a previous promise made to Australia to send a fleet to Singapore could not be kept;(66) would America oblige ? Ambassador Bullitt supported this request from France on April 11, 1939, stating that France would refuse to join Britain in taking action to resist Germany if the British Mediterranean Fleet was sent to Singapore.\(67\) Mr. Roosevelt took the requested prompt action ; on April 15, 1939, the American fleet was ordered into the Pacific.\(68\)

On May 17, 1939, Ambassador Phillips delivered a warning to Count Ciano, stressing one point, “. . . that the American people . . . intend unanimously to concern themselves in European affairs, and it would be folly to think that they would remain aloof in the event of a conflict.”\(69\) Ambassador Davies is supposed to have made a somewhat comparable assertion to Stalin,\(70\) but the limited scope of this chapter forbids any attempt to trace the involved paths of the tortuous negotiations conducted almost simultaneously by Soviet Russia with both Britain and Germany, which eventuated in the public and secret treaties of August 23, 1939, between Germany and Russia, and which were the immediate prelude to the outbreak of the second World War.

Meanwhile, in the United States, Mr. Roosevelt was unsuccessfully attempting to abolish the restraints which the Neutrality Act laid on him. King George VI and Queen Elizabeth had visited him in early June, 1939, but the nature of the conversations which were held at that time are still secret. That Mr. Roosevelt's purposes had not changed is shown by the despairing and prophetic summary which Professor Raymond Moley wrote during the summer of 1939, in the course of which he observed that the administration was “up to its neck in the game of power politics,” and he also stated that “the evidence has all pointed to our active and tireless participation in the game . . .”\(71\)

At a much later date it was revealed that during the summer of 1939 Mr. Bullitt was frequently urging upon Mr. Roosevelt the opinion that the Germans would not fight about Poland if they were faced down.\(72\) Mr. Roosevelt asked Mr. Clarence Dillon to get in secret touch with the British, to urge that Mr. Chamberlain should have greater firmness in dealing with Germany, and Mr. Dillon spoke to this effect to Lord Lothian. Mr. Roosevelt also delivered similar messages to Mr. Kennedy over the transatlantic telephone during the summer of 1939. Mr. Kennedy's view was that the British did not have enough to fight with, and that any conflict between Germany and Britain was superfluous because Germany would later attack Soviet Russia. And Mr. Kennedy later reported that Mr. Chamberlain had said that America and the world Jews had forced Britain into the war.

Indeed, as it has a bearing upon Mr. Roosevelt's aggressive purposes, it should be noted that at a secret conference at Tokyo on May 23, 1939, between Baron Hiranuma and Mr. Eugene H. Dooman, the counselor of the American Embassy, the Japanese Prime Minister suggested that he might sound out Germany and Italy, if Mr. Roosevelt was prepared to approach Britain and France, in order to hold a conference to try to solve the troubles of Europe.\(73\) Mr. Hull viewed this approach as "amazing," and brought it to Mr. Roosevelt's personal attention.\(74\) But a reply was delayed for the better part of three months, by which time circumstances had changed, and a great opportunity which had been neglected was wasted—or evaded.

American preparations for war were proceeding silently and secretly. On June 23, 1939, a secret barter agreement was made with Britain;\(75\) "a good deal of money" was spent to buy various war materials;\(76\) nineteen new merchant ships were launched by August 9 ; contracts were about to be let for one hundred more;\(77\) and on August 10 a War Resources Board was created.\(78\)

IV. AMERICAN POLICY AND THE OUTBREAK OF THE SECOND WORLD WAR

The diplomatic confusion and maneuverings which preceded the outbreak of the second World War can only be touched upon briefly here. But this much should be pointed out. The Russo-German treaties of August 23, 1939, were not only unpopular in Europe ; they met with a hostile Japanese response, and Italy at the last moment refused to fight,⁽⁷⁹⁾ so that on August 25 Chancellor Hitler cancelled the mobilization orders.⁽⁸⁰⁾ It therefore seems to be a legitimate hypothesis to suppose that if American diplomacy had previously been more friendly and affirmative toward Japan and toward Italy, and if the German generals and others who were so earnestly opposed to the Chancellor had been encouraged and supported, the focusing of all this combined strength and opposition might then have led to his immediate downfall. Instead, as we all know, the final result of this political confusion and diplomatic ineptitude was war, after the failure of sincere last-minute Italian efforts to reach a peaceful settlement.⁽⁸¹⁾ Two days after the invasion of Poland, Britain declared war on Germany, and France reluctantly followed the British lead a few hours later.

Very shortly thereafter Mr. Roosevelt decided to ignore the regular procedure of transmitting diplomatic communications through ambassadors and Secretaries of State. Mr. Churchill has stated that on September 11, 1939, Mr. Roosevelt had requested him to send him personal sealed communications through the diplomatic pouches,⁽⁸²⁾ and that there were about two thousand,⁽⁸³⁾ or seventeen hundred,⁽⁸⁴⁾ of these exchanges. The most important business between Britain and America was ultimately transacted through this personal and secret correspondence, and almost all of it has been kept secret to this day.

Meanwhile Mr. Roosevelt held press conferences, made a fireside chat to the nation, and issued various proclamations, including a neutrality proclamation. At all times his protestations of a desire to keep America at peace were strong and profuse. This was the appearance ; the reality was otherwise.

A deceitfully named “neutrality patrol” of American waters was initiated by or before September 22, 1939,(85) but it was not long before American naval vessels were unneutrally directing and escorting British warships to capture German prizes.(86) Wholly contrary to the established rules of international law a so-called neutral zone was extended anywhere from three hundred to one thousand miles out to sea(87) in order to benefit Britain against Germany. Later, on October 18, 1939, the submarines of all the belligerents, except Russia, were forbidden to enter American ports, except in case of force majeure.(88)

Secret preparations were made for American entry into the war.(89) By necessary implication Mr. Roosevelt had lost some of his earlier faith in the overwhelming effect of air power, because plans for the draft were being worked on in September, and by early October they were essentially in the form in which they were enacted about a year later.(90) Wartime taxation was being studied, as was some form of war risk insurance.

Meanwhile Soviet Russia joined in the attack on Poland, and Polish resistance collapsed. Foreign diplomats thought that peace was quite possible, but Mr. Roosevelt was strongly opposed to a negotiated peace.(91) The German attempt to make peace failed, and the period of the “phony” war began.

Mr. Roosevelt had called a special session of Congress for September 21, 1939, in order to amend the Neutrality Act,(92) and, after assuring the country that it was “a shameless and dishonest fake” to assert that any “person in any responsible place . . . in Washington . . . has ever suggested in any shape, manner or form the remotest possibility of sending the boys of American mothers to fight on the battlefields of Europe,” and that the United States “is neutral and does not intend to get involved in war,”(93) he managed to get the cash-and-carry amendments through on November 3, 1939.(94) British and French purchasing commissions were already here, awaiting the passage of the amendments in order to open up. In Mr. Morgenthau’s opinion(95) they did not arm speedily enough, but in about a year it transpired that they had ordered arms far in excess of their capacity to pay for them.

We must hasten over the German surrender of the three little Baltic states to Russia at the end of September, 1939, and the invasion of Finland on November 29, 1939. Likewise space limitations forbid more than a passing reference to Mr. Myron C. Taylor's mission to the Vatican in February, 1940, and Mr. Sumner Welles's trip to Italy, France, Germany, and Great Britain in February and March, 1940. Peace negotiations were in the air, but Mr. Roosevelt, still opposing a negotiated peace, refused to let Mr. Welles participate in them.\(96\) By March 19, 1940, Mr. Roosevelt was allowing our advanced types of aircraft to be sold to Britain and to France,\(97\) while starving the American Army and Navy of them for many months to come. General Arnold often refers\(98\) plaintively but timidly to this problem, which was finally so acute that Secretary Knox wrote in his secret report to Mr. Roosevelt, soon after the Pearl Harbor disaster :

Of course, the best means of defense against air attack consists of fighter planes. Lack of an adequate number of this type of aircraft available to the Army for the defense of the Island is due to the diversion of this type before the outbreak of the war to the British, the Chinese, the Dutch and the Russians.\(99\)

Prior to the attack on Denmark and Norway Mr. Roosevelt had arranged for loans to those countries.\(100\) During May, 1940, along with Mr. Churchill and M. Reynaud, he tried often but secretly\(101\) to keep Italy from entering the war, at first by covert threats, which made Mussolini feel compelled to act quickly, and later by promises of territorial accessions in the Mediterranean area which Mr. Roosevelt offered personally to guarantee. When these secret promises failed, Mr. Roosevelt returned to his original policy of threats, which became much more specific and included a thinly veiled statement of American military intervention.

On May 10, 1940, Germany had opened her attack upon the Low Countries and France, and Mr. Churchill had become Prime Minister. On May 15, 1940, Mr. Churchill cabled Mr. Roosevelt⁽¹⁰²⁾ a long list of requests for tangible aerial, naval, material, and diplomatic help, asking for almost everything except an expeditionary force, and including the abandonment of American neutrality. None of these requests was explicitly refused by Mr. Roosevelt, although he temporized as to granting several of them. The very next day, May 16, Mr. Roosevelt asked the Congress for additional appropriations “for National Defense,”⁽¹⁰³⁾ the first in a 1940 series. And on May 17, 1940, Mr. Roosevelt ordered the remaining older destroyers to be recommissioned.⁽¹⁰⁴⁾ It was his first step toward the destroyer deal, but it was not swift enough to please Mr. Churchill, whose demands soon became importunate and were coupled with intimations that under some circumstances the British Fleet might be surrendered to Germany. One cannot give even a résumé of the correspondence and subsequent negotiations here;⁽¹⁰⁵⁾ it ultimately resulted in the destroyer-bases deal of September 3, 1940.

On May 28, 1940, King Leopold III surrendered the Belgian armies, and next day the evacuation through Dunkirk began. On June 1, Mr. Roosevelt ordered the Army and the Navy to investigate the quantity of arms which could be transferred to Britain, and on June 3 General Marshall authorized sending to Britain half a million rifles, 80,000 machine guns, 900 field guns, and much in the way of other munitions.⁽¹⁰⁶⁾ On June 5, 1940, the Attorney General rendered an opinion that 600,000 rifles and 2,500 field guns, with ammunition, might be sold to Britain as “surplus.” From time to time thereafter more and more weapons were sent, so much more that in early 1941 Mr. Churchill gaily cabled brief thanks to Mr. Hopkins for a “packet” containing a mere quarter of a million rifles and half a billion rounds of ammunition.⁽¹⁰⁷⁾

On June 10, 1940, Italy declared war against France, and on the same day Mr. Roosevelt delivered the speech at the commencement of the University of Virginia in which he said, “the hand that held the dagger has struck it into the back of its neighbor.”\(108\) France resisted Italy with far more ease than Germany, and M. Reynaud was now asking Mr. Roosevelt urgently for help.\(109\) So was Mr. Churchill, who also asked Mr. Roosevelt that hope be held out to France. In France, as resistance began to fail, Mr. Churchill held out the possibility even of an American declaration of war.\(110\) Mr. Roosevelt, on June 13, 1940, cabled M. Reynaud, promising much more material aid and urging that French resistance should continue,\(111\) but he refused to permit his cable to be made public.\(112\)

So France sought an armistice, and almost immediately Mr. Roosevelt began to threaten the French in various ways in order to force them to get their navy out of the way of the Germans before signing an armistice.\(113\) For many months thereafter these threats were renewed from time to time.\(114\)

V. AMERICAN AID TO BRITAIN “ SHORT OF WAR ”

On June 20, 1940, Mr. Woodring was ousted as Secretary of War because he had refused to strip the nation of its defenses in order to aid the Allies ; he was replaced by Mr. Stimson, a confirmed interventionist and an advocate of peacetime conscription. On that same day the draft act was introduced in the Senate, because, if enlistments in the Army are any criterion of public opinion, the country was still overwhelmingly opposed to Mr. Roosevelt’s policies. The Army’s recruiting was a failure;\(115\) only nine thousand men had enlisted after a six weeks’ drive.

On July 2, 1940, Mr. Roosevelt by proclamation prohibited the export of munitions of war and many other goods, except under license. This measure, he later expressly acknowledged,(116) was to promote “the policy of helping Great Britain”; by necessary implication it was intended to prevent any exports to Germany and to Italy. It was about at this time that a naval and military mission was sent to Britain. Nominally it was an exploratory mission,(117) but out of it the secret joint Anglo-American staff plans of January, 1941, ensued.

On July 19, 1940, Chancellor Hitler appealed to Great Britain to make peace.(118) His offer was serious, and competent observers believed that Britain would have been tempted to accept it, had it not been for Mr. Roosevelt’s opposition.(119) Russo-German relations were already deteriorating, and German plans to attack Russia were in the earliest stage of their formation.(120) Chancellor Hitler wanted, and expected to obtain, peace with Britain. When peace was rejected hasty plans to attack Britain were initiated in July,(121) disputed between the German navy and the German army in August, and abandoned in September(122) in order to concentrate upon the Russian adventure.(123)

In the United States Mr. Roosevelt was busily occupied in finding a way to circumvent the Congress(124) and consummate the destroyer deal, in undertaking the defense of Canada, in helping Mr. Churchill with a variety of relatively minor diplomatic intrigues, and, most particularly, in winning the third-term election by giving more profuse and more sweeping promises “again and again and again” to maintain “peace during the next four years”(125) and “to keep our people out of foreign wars.”(126) Along with these activities Mr. Roosevelt deceived the Congress into authorizing, in late August, that the National Guard be ordered into active service for “training efficiency.”(127) He also managed to secure the passage of the first peacetime conscription act by September 16, 1940,(128) but it was limited to twelve months of “training” and the draftees could not be sent outside of the Western Hemisphere.

Once the election was won “on which our fate . . . depended,”\(129\) Mr. Churchill had further demands to make. It took him over three weeks to compose a letter, almost ten pages long when printed,\(130\) which was delivered to Mr. Roosevelt on December 9, 1940. The requests were more formidable and contemplated the continuance of the war for at least two more years ; this was the genesis of lend-lease.

By December 12, 1940,\(131\) joint staff conversations with the British had been secretly commenced in London, Manila, and Washington. They continued through the early part of 1941, and out of them the American-British-Dutch war plans were developed. The first war plan was against Germany ; the second war plan was against Japan, and Mr. Roosevelt approved both of these plans “except officially,”\(132\) as Admiral Stark put it. Continued secrecy still prevents a positive statement as to the constitution of a formal alliance at this time, but the distinction between a formal alliance and a gentleman’s agreement which had been established and approved, “except officially,” seems trifling.\(133\) What is of vastly greater concern is that neither the American people nor the Congress were allowed to know the truth. The vital implications of these joint staff conferences in regard to the involvement of the United States in the war were fully sensed by Admiral Stark. At the close of the conferences he wrote to his fleet commanders that “The question as to our entry into the war now seems to be when, and not whether.”\(133a\)

In early January, 1941, Mr. Hopkins had flown to London to confer with Mr. Churchill. Mr. Hopkins’ laconic report, “I told of my mission,”\(134\) is expanded in Mr. Churchill’s version of it to a more sweeping undertaking :

The President is determined that we shall win the war together. Make no mistake about it.

He has sent me here to tell you that at all costs and by all means he will carry you through, no matter what happens to him—there is nothing that he will not do so far as he has human power.\(135\)

Meanwhile Mr. Roosevelt had asked the Congress for lend-lease, and on January 10, 1941, the bill, drafted in the offices of Mr. Stimson and of Mr. Morgenthau,(136) was introduced. Space forbids an extended account of all the political maneuvering which accomplished it.(137) One can only state three matters in a summary way : first, that vague terror stories about an invasion crisis facing Britain—in the event, a quite false and synthetic crisis—were employed as one of the propaganda devices to secure its enactment ; second, that in consequence of its passage on March 9, 1941, the Congress surrendered the war-making power to Mr. Roosevelt, and enabled him to make war, declared or undeclared, anywhere in the world ; and third, that lend-lease, like most of Mr. Roosevelt's other measures, was wholly unneutral and contrary to the elementary rules of international law.

In mid-January, 1941, another and more fateful thread was woven into the pattern. The American State Department, at Mr. Roosevelt's specific instruction, warned(138) the Russian ambassador, Mr. Constantine Oumansky,(139) of the contemplated German attack, and these warnings were later repeated.(140) By early February, 1941, the eastern movement of the German troops was well known.(141) Everything pointed toward an extension of the war by a German attack on Russia, but Anglo-American power politics succeeded in delaying it for five weeks.(142) The great cost of the sacrifice, made in order to obtain this small delay for Soviet Russia's benefit, was the loss of Yugoslavia, Greece, and Crete, the crippling of the British Mediterranean Fleet,(143) and the British defeat in Libya.(144) In the diplomatic intrigues in Greece and in Yugoslavia Americans(145) played a substantial and quite successful part in opposing Germany. Later, as the time approached for the commencement of the attack on Russia, Mr. Churchill meditated upon what his policy should be and concluded that he should "give all encouragement and any help we can spare." He cabled this to Mr. Roosevelt,(146) who replied in the sense of carte blanche—he would publicly endorse "any announcement that the Prime Minister might make welcoming Russia as an ally."

In the autumn of 1938 the French military experts had expressed \(147\) to Mr. Bullitt the view that “. . . the war would last at least six years and would . . . end in the complete destruction of Europe, and with communism reigning in all States. Undoubtedly, at the conclusion, the benefits would be taken by Russia.” So far as can be ascertained neither Mr. Roosevelt nor Mr. Churchill had such prudent misgivings in June, 1941. Or, if they did, their strong antipathy toward Germany prevented them from acting with the cold and detached realism which is so necessary in the successful practice of power politics.

After the passage of the Lend-Lease Act Mr. Roosevelt seemed to view the United States as being in the European war “except officially.” \(148\) But in the light of the many campaign promises which he had made, and also of the explicit pledge contained in the Democratic party’s platform, he felt that he could not enter the war officially unless and until he could persuade the nation that there had been an “attack” by Germany. Until that time came he would engage in a secret and undeclared war, \(149\) hoping to drive the Germans into shooting first. \(150\)

It was on March 6, 1941, that Mr. Roosevelt expressed a portion of his purposes to the Polish ambassador, saying, “. . . we Americans will have to buy this war as such. Let us hope at the price of Lend-Lease only. But who can say what price we may ultimately have to pay ?” \(151\)

In March, 1941, American officers went to Britain to select naval bases for use in convoying, \(152\) and air fields, and as soon as they had been selected the construction work began. Damaged British warships were to be repaired in American navy yards. In April two million tons of shipping were obtained and sent through the Red Sea in order to aid the British campaigns in the Mediterranean area, and a large supply base was secretly set up at Basra. \(153\) Also in that month the movements of American war vessels were coordinated with those of the British and arrangements were made for secret intercommunication. \(154\) And finally it was on April 18, 1941, that Mr. Roosevelt extended out to 26° West—over two thousand miles from New York—the claimed boundary of the Western Hemisphere(155)—wherein American warships would aid the British. The order providing for this action was issued on April 24, 1941.(156) In March, 1941, American army planes began patrolling the North Atlantic, out of Newfoundland,(157) against German submarines ; in April, 1941, Greenland was occupied;(158) in May, 1941, plans were made,(159) and later abandoned, to seize the Azores and Martinique. Meanwhile Mr. Roosevelt debated whether to order American submarines to attack and sink the German battleship Bismarck.(160) In June Mr. Roosevelt agreed with Mr. Churchill to relieve the British troops in Iceland,(161) and this was done on July 7, 1941. It was also in June, 1941, that Mr. Roosevelt ordered the closing of all the German and Italian consulates in the United States.

In the middle of May Mr. Roosevelt had announced publicly that twenty-four cargo ships were about to depart for the Red Sea in spite of the German proclamation of a war zone in that area.(162) These vessels had to sail between Africa and South America, and in that general area the Robin Moor was sunk a few days later. Mr. Roosevelt had successfully provoked an incident, and in a message to the Congress he called it an “act of piracy,” and “the act of an international outlaw,”(163) but the American public declined to be aroused.

Meanwhile the German Führer was taking no chances over the creation of any incident. He had long since prohibited unrestricted submarine warfare and the sinking of passenger ships;(164) he had also strictly forbidden any injury to friendly nations’ vessels or to those of the United States, outside of the war zone closely adjacent to the British Isles.(165) When the so-called neutrality patrol in the “neutrality zone” was established, Chancellor Hitler secretly ordered all German warships to avoid any incidents in it.(166) When Mr. Roosevelt extended the boundaries of the Western Hemisphere much further to the east, the Führer still continued to prohibit the creation of any incidents.(167) Nevertheless Mr. Roosevelt was still hoping in early June that he could “drive the Germans into shooting first.”(168)

Late June and July, 1941, were largely concerned with the aftermath of the German attack on Russia. Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Hopkins, and others rushed in to swamp Russia with offers of American aid. Theirs seems to have been the extremely simple policy of giving unlimited and unconditional aid not only to the true enemies of Germany but also to that nation's former accomplices.(169) Mr. Churchill could at least speak tartly(170) of the Communists' view "that they were conferring a great favour on us by fighting in their own country for their own lives," but when Mr. Hopkins went to Russia "in return for the offer of such aid he asked nothing."(171) Fulfillment of the Russian demands was given a first priority by Mr. Roosevelt over everything else,(172) and materials and equipment were diverted to Russia in late 1941 over the opposition and in spite of strong protests from the Armed Forces.(173)

The diminution of American supplies to Britain in consequence of this prospective diversion was only one of the reasons which led Mr. Churchill to seek the Atlantic Conference meeting which was held about mid-August, 1941.(174) Mr. Churchill had frequently attempted to bring the United States into the war as a belligerent. The British had hoped for this in June, 1940 ; they had expected it a few days after the third-term election was won ;(175) they had looked for it again about the first of May,(176) and Mr. Churchill sought to obtain it at the conference.(177) There is some reason to believe that the American Chiefs of Staff felt that their forces were not as yet ready for war and that they dissuaded Mr. Roosevelt from taking drastic action immediately.(178)

However, the Atlantic Charter, in providing for Anglo-American co-operation in "the policing of the world" during a transitional period following the close of the second World War, assumed by a tacit but inescapable implication that the United States would presently become involved in the war. This implication is fortified by the preponderance of the top military and naval staff personnel who were present. What was, on their agenda has never been fully disclosed, but it included war plans generally(179) and specific discussions about expeditions to seize the Azores, the Canaries, and the Cape Verde Islands.(180) The activities of the American navy were to be extended in the North Atlantic,(181) and Mr. Roosevelt repeated to Mr. Churchill his predilection for an undeclared war, saying, “I may never declare war ; I may make war. If I were to ask Congress to declare war, they might argue about it for three months.”(182) There was also a long discussion of Far Eastern affairs, which falls outside the scope of this chapter.

VI. THE “ SHOOTING WAR ” BEGINS

Within a fortnight after the termination of the Atlantic Conference—on August 25, 1941—Mr. Roosevelt gave secret orders to the Atlantic Fleet to attack and destroy German and Italian “hostile forces”; this was the putting into effect of War Plan 51.(183) Ten days later, on September 4, 1941, there was an incident between an American destroyer, the Greer, and a German submarine. If the Greer obeyed her secret orders she necessarily attacked the submarine, but it was stated for public consumption that she was attacked. This was doubted at the time. The Navy Department, it should be noted, refused to furnish the log of the Greer to the Senate,(184) and thus establish whether the official claim was the truth.

Mr. Roosevelt capitalized on this incident in a fireside chat delivered on September 11, 1941.(185) He claimed it was an attack, “piracy legally and morally,” and that the Nazis were “international outlaws.” And he said,

. . . When you see a rattlesnake poised to strike, you do not wait until he has struck before you crush him.

These Nazi submarines and raiders are the rattlesnakes of the Atlantic. . . .

. . . From now on, if German or Italian vessels of war enter the waters the protection of which is necessary for American defense, they will do so at their own peril.

This was the shoot-on-sight speech, and it publicly announced a small portion of the substance of War Plan 51, which was already secretly in effect. Mr. Churchill mentioned in a “most secret” letter to General Smuts⁽¹⁸⁶⁾ that the American people had been kept quite ignorant of “the vast area to which it is to be applied.” Here, indeed, was undeclared war. On September 13 Mr. Roosevelt ordered the Atlantic Fleet to escort convoys in which there were no American vessels.⁽¹⁸⁷⁾ It was also at about this time that Mr. Roosevelt agreed to furnish Mr. Churchill with “our best transport ships”—twelve liners and twenty cargo vessels, manned by American crews—to transport two British divisions to the Middle East.⁽¹⁸⁸⁾ At an earlier date fifty American tankers⁽¹⁸⁹⁾ had been transferred to Britain, and four to Russia, which led to a gasoline shortage and a curfew in the eastern United States.

Another incident occurred on October 17, 1941, when an American destroyer, the Kearny, dropped depth charges on a German submarine,⁽¹⁹⁰⁾ which replied to the attack by torpedoing the Kearny. Ten days later Mr. Roosevelt, who again claimed that this was an unprovoked German attack, delivered a “scare-mongering election-eve”⁽¹⁹¹⁾ type of speech in which he claimed that “. . . the shooting has started, and history has recorded who fired the first shot.”⁽¹⁹²⁾ Then, in a passage the importance of which seems to have been overlooked at that time, he guardedly hinted that the Republic was bound by his secret commitments, saying significantly, “Very simply and very bluntly—we are pledged to pull our own oar in the destruction of Hitlerism.” (Emphasis supplied.) Mr. Roosevelt claimed to have news of a German plan to abolish all religions in Germany, and throughout the world—“if Hitler wins.” Also he claimed to have a map proving the German intention to conquer Latin America and redistrict it into five vassal states—but at his next press conference(193) he made excuses and refused to reveal it.

On October 31, 1941, an older destroyer, the Reuben James, was torpedoed about seven hundred miles eastward of Newfoundland,(194) and more lives were lost. The American public's reaction to it was expressed by Admiral Stark in a confidential letter to Admiral Kimmel at Pearl Harbor : “Believe it or not, the Reuben James set recruiting back about 15%.”(195) This illustrates the continuance of public opposition to involvement in the war. In mid-August the length of service required under the draft act had been extended, in violation of the obligations of good faith toward the draftees. The administration had had to use all of its political and patronage powers to force this extension, and, even so, the vote in the House was 203 to 202.(196) From New England, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, across the Midwest and out to the Northwest, every single state (except Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Montana, which split fifty-fifty) voted two to one, or by larger majorities, against the extension of the draft act.(197) Public opinion was, of course, far more preponderantly against involvement in the war than this vote showed.

By the time that October, 1941, had ended, Mr. Roosevelt's undeclared war in the Atlantic had become a reality and was in full swing. But this was not enough. The war powers could not be exercised under our Constitution until there was a formal and declared war, and of that there was no immediate prospect. As Count Ciano had noted, when at the German General Headquarters, “. . . The Germans have firmly decided to do nothing which will accelerate or cause America's entry into the war. . . .”(198) Because of this German attitude Mr. Roosevelt, as of the end of October, 1941, had no further ideas how to get into a formal and declared war : “. . . He had said everything ‘short of war’ that could be said. He had no more tricks left. The hat from which he had pulled so many rabbits was empty. . . .”(199) The only thing that he could think of to do was to continue to stall,(200) for the front door to war in Europe appeared to be firmly barred. Germany and Italy seemed resolved to decline the progressively increasing challenges of Mr. Roosevelt's unneutral actions and policies.

But there were back doors as well as front doors. There was always the uneasy state of affairs in the Far East. On the one hand a peaceful solution of the Japanese problem would have released much American power for use in Europe. Moreover, it seemed incredible—at least to Mr. Churchill(201)—that Japan would commit political suicide by going to war with the United States and Britain. On the other hand, if this view was correct and if certain American diplomatic officials were not mistaken in believing that Japan could be quickly defeated, perhaps a Japanese war would solve Mr. Roosevelt's problems without involving too much delay in his purpose to conquer Germany. Maybe the longest way round was the shortest way home.

It was complicated. Either way there were pros and cons. But Mr. Roosevelt was a complicated man, too, not a simple one. His intentions were complex and his “plans were never thoroughly thought out.”(202) Therefore it may be true that there was a complex ambivalence, not thoroughly thought out, in Mr. Roosevelt's attitude toward the expedience of peace or war with Japan. It is quite possible that he did not fully commit himself to the latter choice until late in November, 1941. By his own express declarations we know that he deliberately temporized. Temporizing is sometimes merely a way to postpone making a decision, but it may also be a method of awaiting a favorable opportunity to put into effect a decision already made.

By November 25, 1941, Mr. Roosevelt and his cabinet(203) were debating how to “maneuver [the Japanese] into the position of firing the first shot without allowing too much danger to ourselves.” On December 1, 1941, Mr. Roosevelt very secretly issued the needless order to send the Cockleshell Warships(204) to their appointed positions for destruction. But other and mightier events were in motion : before an entire week had passed Mr. Churchill(205) could go to bed and sleep

“the sleep of the saved and thankful. . . . So we had won after all ! . . . Britain would live . . . and the Empire would live. . . . United we could subdue everybody else in the world. . . . We might not even have to die as individuals.”

So may it be ! But designs, least of all designs for war, do not always eventuate as their planners intend. The design for the war which began at Pearl Harbor was a zigzag growth rooted in secrecy, unneutrality, misrepresentation, and deceit. Morally speaking, such a tree could not have been expected to bear good fruit, and it did not.

As it eventuated, Japan was not an easy conquest ; she was the last enemy to surrender to us. And always a malign miasma seemed to haunt that air. It was against Japan that we dropped the atom bombs and thus revealed their existence to the world—needlessly, as it transpired. And needlessly, as it also transpired, the secret deals and agreements were made with Russia at Yalta. Thus Russia came into Manchuria, China, and North Korea. The end of that story is a tale yet to be told. Perhaps future historians will some day trace there the origins of the third world war, but if they do so, they will not be entirely correct. The roots run more deeply than that. They run back to Mr. Roosevelt’s abandonment of neutrality ; they involve his diplomatic maladroitness, and they involve his lack of ability to think out his plans thoroughly. Not least, there remains Mr. Roosevelt’s penchant for secrecy and for the deceit of his own people as well as of others. Perhaps it may be true—perhaps it may yet be generally agreed—that even in the conduct of foreign affairs honesty is the best policy.

FOOTNOTES—CHAPTER 3

1. Cordell Hull, Memoirs, (2 vols.; New York : The Macmillan Company, 1948), I, 790. It was later believed that Mr. Roosevelt’s telephone calls, at least to Ambassador Bullitt, were intercepted by the Germans. See Hearings Before the Joint Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbor Attack, 79 Cong., 2 sess. (39 parts; Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1946) Part III, p. 1213. (The Hearings will hereinafter be designated Pearl Harbor Attack.)

2. For a condensed résumé of facts proving the absence of any planned conspiracy, see Frederic R. Sanborn, Design For War (New York : Devin-Adair Company, 1951), p. 58, 60, 173, 268. Cf. H.L. Trefousse, Germany and American Neutrality (New York : Bookman Associates, 1951), p. 150. Even the judgment at the Nuremberg trials admits that no “single conspiracy” could be proven : 6 Federal Rules Decisions, pp. 111-12. See also The United States at War (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1946), pp. 507-8.

3. Peace and War : United States Foreign Policy, 1931-1941, Department of State, Publication 1853 (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1942) , p. 47.

4. Sumner Welles, The Time for Decision (New York : Harper & Brothers, 1944), p. 288.

5. Charles Cheney Hyde, International Law Chiefly as Interpreted and Applied by the United States (Boston : Little, Brown & Company, 1922), II, 765.

6. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt ; edited by Samuel I. Rosenman (13 vols.; New York : The Macmillan Company, 1941), VII, 249-58 : interview of April 20, 1938.

7. Ibid., VIII, xxxviii-xxxix.

8. Robert E. Sherwood, Roosevelt and Hopkins, An Intimate History (New York : Harper & Brothers, 1948), p. 438.

9. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, VI, 406-11.

10. For a résumé, see Sanborn, op. cit., pp. 7-19.

11. John T. Flynn, Country Squire in the White House (New York : Doubleday, Doran & Company, Inc., 1940), p. 103 ; cf. William D. Leahy, I Was There (New York : Whittlesey House, 1950), p. 64.

12. Winston S. Churchill, The Gathering Storm, (Boston : Houghton Mifflin Company, 1948), p. 247 ; Hull, op. cit., I, 549, 573.

13. Raymond Moley, After Seven Years (New York : Harper & Brothers, 1939) p. 379. See Hull, op. cit., I, 684, which acknowledges the existence of this point of view.

14. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part IX, pp. 4272-76.

15. New York Times, October 24, 1947, p. 1, cols. 2-3.

16. Hull, op. cit., 1, 563-64.
17. Ibid., 1, 576-77 ; Peace and War, pp. 54-55.
18. Emil Ludwig, Roosevelt (New York : The Viking Press, 1938), p. 272.
19. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, VII, 413.
20. New York Times, November 18, 1938, pp. 1, 12, 13.
21. The German White Paper ; full text of the Polish documents issued by the Berlin Foreign Office ; with a foreword by C. Hartley Grattan (New York : Howell, Soskin & Co., 1940), p. 15. This condition was equally well known to the Germans at that time ; see Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1946), III, 281.
22. German White Paper, p. 16.
23. Adolf Hitler, My New Order ; edited with commentary by Raoul de Roussy de Sales (New York : Reynal & Hitchcock, 1941), p. 504.
24. Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, I, 525.
25. Churchill, The Gathering Storm, p. 293.
26. Hull, op. cit., I, 589.
27. Ibid., I, 590.
28. Ibid., I, 590-91.
29. Churchill, The Gathering Storm, p. 310.
30. Waverly Root, The Secret History of the War (2 vols.; New York : Charles Scribner's Sons, 1945), I, 6, 10. Exactly this hostile combination had been foreseen by the Germans about a month previously ; see also Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, III, 280.
31. Louis Fischer, Men and Politics, An Autobiography (New York : Duell, Sloan & Peace, 1941), p. 556.
32. Ibid., p. 570.
33. Ibid., p. 570 ; see also Churchill, The Gathering Storm, p. 309.
34. William L. Shirer, Berlin Diary (New York : Alfred A. Knopf, 1941), pp. 142-43 ; see also Hans Bernd Gisevius, To the Bitter End (Boston : Houghton Mifflin Company, 1947) p. 324.

35. Gisevius, op. cit., pp. 319-26 ; see also Churchill, The Gathering Storm, pp. 311-14.
36. Churchill, The Gathering Storm, p. 314.
37. Hull, op. cit., I, 591.
38. Ibid., I, 592.
39. Ibid., I, 593.
40. Ibid.
41. Ibid., I, 590.
42. Ibid., I, 592-93.
43. H.H. Arnold, Global Mission (New York : Harper & Brothers, 1949), pp. 177-79.
44. Sherwood, op. cit., p. 100.
45. Ibid., p. 101.
46. Fischer, op. cit., p. 564.
47. German White Paper, pp. 19-21.
48. Moley, op. cit., pp. 379-80.
49. Arnold, op. cit., p. 185.
50. The Ciano Diaries, 1939-1943 ; [his] complete unabridged diaries ; edited by Hugh Gibson ; introduction by Sumner Welles (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday & Company, Inc., 1946), p. 3.
51. Ibid., p. 5.
52. Arnold, op. cit., 185.
53. Sanborn, op. cit., p. 55.
54. German White Paper, p. 44.
55. Ibid., pp. 32-33.
56. Ibid., p. 45.
57. The Ciano Diaries, pp. 42-44.

58. Sanborn, op. cit., pp. 58-60.
59. The Ciano Diaries, p. 49.
60. Trefousse, op. cit., p. 20.
61. German White Paper, pp. 51-54.
62. Ibid.
63. Ibid.
64. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, VIII, 185-86.
65. German White Paper, p. 59.
66. Hull, op. cit., I, 630.
67. Ibid.
68. Ibid.
69. The Ciano Diaries, p. 83.
70. Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, VI, 890.
71. Moley, op. cit., p. 382.
72. Walter Millis (ed.), The Forrestal Diaries (New York : The Viking Press, 1951), pp. 121-22.
73. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part XX, p. 4139.
74. Ibid., Part XX, p. 4168. Nine years later Mr. Hull claimed that he was “more than skeptical” of this proposal ; see The Memoirs of Cordell Hull, I, 631. But no suggestion of skepticism appears in his 1939 memorandum to Mr. Roosevelt.
75. Peace and War, p. 61 ; International Transactions of the U.S., etc., p. 27 ; Hull, op. cit., I, 625.
76. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, VIII, 568.
77. Ibid., VIII, 438.
78. The United States at War (Washington, D.C., 1946), p. 16.
79. Sanborn, op. cit., p. 85.

80. Ulrich von Hassell, The Von Hassell Diaries, 1938-1944 (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday & Company, Inc., 1947), p. 63.
81. The Ciano Diaries, pp. 129-30, 132, 134, 136 ; The Von Hassell Diaries, p. 73.
82. Churchill, The Gathering Storm, p. 440.
83. Ibid., p. 441.
84. Churchill, Their Finest Hour, p. 23.
85. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, VIII, 525-27.
86. Fuehrer Conferences on Matters Dealing with the German Navy (Washington, D.C.: Navy Department, Office of Naval Intelligence, 1947), II, 48 ; Trefousse, op. cit., p. 42.
87. Hull, op. cit., I, 689-91.
88. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, VIII, 552-54.
89. The United States at War, pp. 21-22.
90. Sanborn, op. cit., p. 92.
91. Sherwood, op. cit., p. 126.
92. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, VIII, 512-22.
93. Ibid., VIII, 554-57.
94. Ibid., VIII, 524.
95. "The Morgenthau Diaries," Collier's, CXX (October 18, 1947) 72.
96. The Ciano Diaries, p. 222 ; cf. Welles, op. cit., pp. 135, 139.
97. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, IX, pp. 104-8.
98. Arnold, op. cit., pp. 190, 193, 196-98, 203, 215, 241, 245, 251, 256, 258, 264-67.
99. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part XXIV, p. 1753. This report is not dated, but from other evidence it would seem that it should be dated about December 15, 1941.
100. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, IX, 51. 101.
101. Sanborn, op. cit., pp. 108-10.

102. Churchill, Their Finest Hour, pp. 24-25.
103. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, IX, 198-205.
104. Ibid., IX, 213.
105. See Sanborn, op. cit., pp. 117, 129, 135, 140-42, 170-71, 179-84 ; Arnold, op. cit., pp. 234-35 ; cf. pp. 230, 232.
106. Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., Lend-Lease, Weapon for Victory (New York : The Macmillan Company, 1944), pp. 24-25. "The subterfuge was obvious . . ." wrote Mr. Stimson. See Henry L. Stimson and McGeorge Bundy, On Active Service in Peace and War (New York : Harper & Brothers, 1948), p. 356. See also Hull, op. cit., I, 775.
107. Churchill, The Grand Alliance (Boston : Houghton Mifflin Company, 1950), p. 127 ; cf. 732, 741.
108. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, IX, 259-64.
109. Hull, op. cit., I, 767-75.
110. Churchill, Their Finest Hour, pp. 179-81.
111. Peace and War, pp. 74-75 ; Churchill, Their Finest Hour, pp. 183-84 ; Sherwood, Roosevelt and Hopkins, p. 145. Mr. Sherwood's version differs from Mr. Churchill's ; which one is not paraphrased ?
112. Churchill, Their Finest Hour, p. 187.
113. Peace and War, p. 76.
114. Leahy, op. cit., p. 9.
115. Life, IX, No. 1 (July 1, 1940), 7.
116. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, IX, 281.
117. Churchill, The Grand Alliance, p. 137.
118. Adolf Hitler, My New Order, pp. 809-38 ; especially pp. 836-38.
119. Shirer, op. cit., pp. 453, 457-59, 550-52, 561 ; The Ciano Diaries, p. 227 ; cf. Hull, op. cit., I, 844-45.
120. Shirer, op. cit., pp. 450, 550 ; Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, V, 741.

121. Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, III, 399-400.
122. The Ciano Diaries, p. 296.
123. Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, III, 406-7 ; see also the Fuehrer Conferences, II, 22-23.
124. Sherwood, op. cit., p. 175.
125. The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, IX, 541-43.
126. Ibid., IX, 530-39.
127. Ibid., IX, 313-14.
128. Ibid., IX, p. 428.
129. Churchill, Their Finest Hour, p. 187.
130. Ibid., pp. 558-67.
131. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part XIV, p. 984 ; Part XX, pp. 4075-76 : Sherwood, op. cit., pp. 271-73.
132. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part V, p. 2391 ; Part III, pp. 994-97.
133. Compare Mr. Sherwood's simile of a common-law marriage, Roosevelt and Hopkins, p. 270. Note General Arnold's observation, Global Mission, p. 244—"we were forming a very close alliance with the British."
- 133a. On April 3, 1941 ; Pearl Harbor Attack, Part XVII, p. 2463.
134. Sherwood, op. cit., p. 238.
135. Churchill, The Grand Alliance, p. 23.
136. "The Morgenthau Diaries," Collier's, CXX (October 18, 1947), 74 ; Hull, op. cit., I, 873 ; Sherwood, op. cit., p. 228.
137. For a fuller account, see Sanborn, op. cit., pp. 701-33.
138. Franklin D. Roosevelt and Pius XII, Wartime Correspondence ; with an introduction and explanatory notes by Myron C. Taylor (New York : The Macmillan Company, 1947), p. 49 ; Victor Kravchenko, I Chose Freedom ; the Personal and Political Life of a Soviet Official (New York : Charles Scribner's Sons, 1946), pp. 352, 363 ; Hull, op. cit., II, 967-68.

139. For Mr. Oumansky's background, see W.G. Krivitsky, In Stalin's Secret Service (New York : Harper & Brothers, 1939), pp. 37-38. Mr. Hull (Memoirs, I, 743, 807, 809 ; II, 971) dryly appraised the Russian ambassador as "a walking insult when at his worst"—"sarcasm poured from the Ambassador like wheat from a thresher"—he "thought that firmness meant rudeness."
140. Hull, op. cit., II, 968, 973 ; Churchill, The Grand Alliance, p. 367. Mr. Root's account of the Russian preparations, The Secret History of the War, I, 499-519 seems to be predicated upon General Stalin's intention of attacking Germany at a slightly later date, op. cit., p. 510.
141. Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, V, 740 ; Churchill, The Grand Alliance, p. 26.
142. Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, V, 740 ; Churchill, The Grand Alliance, p. 192.
143. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part IX, pp. 4299-300.
144. Cf. Churchill, The Grand Alliance, pp. 104, 110, 205.
145. Sanborn, op. cit., pp. 253-55.
146. Churchill, The Grand Alliance, p. 369.
147. German White Paper, p. 20.
148. See the views of Admiral Stark, Pearl Harbor Attack, Part XVII, pp. 2462-63 ; and of General Arnold, Global Mission, p. 259.
149. New York Times, May 17, 1941, p. 1, col. 8, continued on p. 4, col. 2 ; Blair Bolles, Foreign Policy Reports, August 1, 1945, p. 145.
150. Sanborn, op. cit., p. 265.
151. Jan Ciechanowski, Defeat in Victory (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday & Company, Inc., 1947), pp. 1, 5-6. One is tempted to recall Mr. H.L. Mencken's hard saying (Life, XXI, No. 6 [August 5, 1946], 46) about Mr. Roosevelt's error in "pulling ashore the corpse of the British Empire."
152. Trefousse, op. cit., p. 88 ; Churchill, The Grand Alliance, p. 138.
153. Churchill, ibid., pp. 254, 754.
154. Ibid., p. 144.
155. Sherwood, op. cit., pp. 291-92, 310 ; Churchill, The Grand Alliance, pp. 140-45.
156. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part V, p. 2793 ; Churchill, The Grand Alliance, pp. 144-45, 244.

157. Elliott Roosevelt, As He Saw It (New York : Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1946), pp. 14-15.
158. Ernest J. King, Our Navy at War, p. 6 ; cf. Peace and War, pp. 99-100 ; Hull, op. cit., II, 935-39 ; note I, 754-58.
159. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part V, p. 2113 ; Part XVI, pp. 2168-70 ; Part III, pp. 1077, 1436-37 ; Part XV, p. 1631.
160. Sherwood, op. cit., p. 295.
161. Churchill, The Grand Alliance, pp. 149-50 ; Hull, op. cit., II, 947 ; cf. Sanborn, op. cit., pp. 309-12.
162. New York Times, May 17, 1941, p. 1, Col. 8 ; Churchill, The Grand Alliance, pp. 282-83.
163. New York Times, June 6, 1941, p. I, col. 8 ; text on p. 6, cols. 4-6.
164. Trefousse, op. cit., pp. 35-37.
165. Ibid., p. 39.
166. Ibid., pp. 40-41, 61, 85-87.
167. Ibid., pp. 88-89.
168. Sanborn, op. cit., p. 265.
169. New York Times, May 28, 1941, p. 2, cols. 2-8 ; Sherwood, op. cit., p. 298.
170. Churchill, The Grand Alliance, p. 388.
171. William C. Bullitt, The Great Globe Itself (New York : Charles Scribner's Sons, 1946), p. 11.
172. Stettinius, op. cit., p. 123.
173. The United States at War, p. 82.
174. Elliott Roosevelt, op. cit., pp. 22, 33.
175. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part XIV, p. 972 ; Part XVI, pp. 2448-50.
176. Sherwood, op. cit., p. 263.
177. Churchill, The Grand Alliance, p. 593 ; Elliott Roosevelt, op. cit., pp. 27-30, 41.

178. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part XVI, pp. 2182-83.
179. Arnold, op. cit., pp. 249, 255.
180. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part XIV, pp. 1275-1278 ; Churchill, The Grand Alliance, pp. 437-38.
181. Churchill, ibid., pp. 441, 517.
182. Ibid., p. 593.
183. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part XIV, pp. 1400-1401 ; Part V, pp. 2294-96.
184. Ibid., Part XVI, p. 2210.
185. New York Times, September 12, 1941, p. 1, cols. 6-7 ; text on p. 4, cols. 2-5.
186. Churchill, The Grand Alliance, p. 517.
187. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part V, p. 2295.
188. Churchill, The Grand Alliance, pp. 492-93. Note Admiral Stark's regrets, Pearl Harbor Attack, Part XVI, p. 2221.
189. Newsweek, August 18, 1941, p. 14.
190. Trefousse, op. cit., p. 121.
191. Mr. Lindley's characterization in Newsweek, November 10, 1941, p. 21.
192. New York Times October 28, 1941, p. 1, col. 1 ; text on p. 4, cols. 2-6.
193. Ibid., October 29, 1941, p. 1, cols. 2-3.
194. Admiral King, op. cit., p. 6.
195. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part XVI, p. 2224.
196. The United States at War, p. 72.
197. Newsweek, August 25, 1941, pp. 16-17.
198. The Ciano Diaries, p. 398.
199. Sherwood, op. cit., p. 383 ; cf. Churchill, The Grand Alliance, p. 539.

200. Sherwood, op. cit., p. 420.
201. Churchill, The Grand Alliance, p. 603.
202. Frances Perkins, The Roosevelt I Knew (New York : The Viking Press, Inc., 1946), p. 163.
203. Pearl Harbor Attack, Part XI, p. 5433 ; Part XX, pp. 4113-14.
204. Sanborn, op. cit., pp. 515-18.
205. Churchill, The Grand Alliance, pp. 606-8.

IT'S UP TO US

by

JAMES P. WARBURG

"If we could first know where we are and whither we are tending, we could better judge what to do, and how to do it."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

NEW YORK • ALFRED • A • KNOPF

1934

THE MONEY MUDDLE

by James P. Warburg

"An intensely interesting and most revealing account of the monetary history of this country since President Roosevelt took office."

—PROFESSOR WALTER E. SPAHR

Secretary of Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy

"The liveliest and in some respects the most interesting book that has yet appeared on the first year of the New Deal."

—THOMAS F. WOODLOCK, in the Wall Street Journal

"Mr. Warburg has rendered an invaluable service in preparing this volume and has presented his material in an unusually vigorous and effective manner."

—PROFESSOR ERNEST MINOR PATTERSON

President of the American Academy of Political and Social Science

"... all in a racy style that proves that economics is not a dismal science, for the book abounds in epigrams. There is a good deal of difference between an epigram and a wisecrack."

—New York Herald Tribune

A BORZOI BOOK PUBLISHED BY

Alfred A. Knopf

*Copyright 1934 by James P. Warburg
All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced in any form without permission in writing from the publisher, except by a reviewer who may quote brief passages in a review to be printed in a magazine or newspaper.*

FIRST EDITION

Manufactured in the United States of America

To Our Own Awakening

Foreword

By March 1934 it had become evident that in the minds of most people recovery under the New Deal was neither adequate nor assured.

No amount of statistical evidence of recovery and no amount of ballyhoo could hide the fact that the people as a whole, while in many respects encouraged, were still profoundly dissatisfied, wanted something more out of the New Deal than they had got so far, and were puzzled to know just what it was that they wanted.

It was equally evident that Senators and Representatives were no less puzzled than the people. Hardly a day passed in Congress without some new radical proposal being put forward. Most of them died. A few were enacted. To say that proposals for silver legislation, for paying a bonus to war veterans, for paying off depositors in closed banks, and such-like were political maneuvers designed to catch votes in the autumn elections is only to state the same thing in a different way. Unless the candidates for re-election believed that the people wanted such action, they would scarcely hope to get votes by advocating it.

By March 1934 it was becoming clear that there were, broadly speaking, three ways open to the Administration:

1. It could pursue further the course of inflation, upon which it had already embarked, in the belief that our basic trouble was monetary and could therefore be cured by monetary means.

2. It could pursue further the march towards an authoritarian state, upon which it had likewise embarked, in the belief that a certain amount of government planning and regimentation was necessary to recovery. And

3. It could call a halt in both of the above-stated procedures and execute an about-face in the direction of abandoning further inflation and monetary experimentation, and abandoning the idea that government initiative should partially or wholly supplant private initiative. Such an about-face would have involved various positive and negative actions, both designed towards the major objective of stimulating private enterprise.

During recent months it has become increasingly evident that the New Deal so far has involved a mixture of the first two courses—a mixture which is in many respects similar to a man who tries to walk east on one foot and west on the other. That is why we have witnessed recently such violent attacks upon those who would pursue the course of planned economy and regimentation, launched by the advocates of further inflation. The inflationists—such as the Committee for the Nation—have come to realize that they have little or nothing in common with that element in the New Deal which produced the agricultural program, the N.R.A., or the Securities Act. Conversely, the regimenters have come to see in the inflationists the arch enemies of their program. A few months ago it was impossible to make people realize that there was a fundamental inconsistency between the Administration's monetary policy and its industrial and agricultural measures. Today that inconsistency is recognized by an ever-increasing number of people.

It has been my purpose throughout the last year to point out, if I could, the necessity for adopting the third course which I have just indicated; that is, a course which clearly abandons both the idea of further inflation and the idea of further development along the lines of planned economy.

In order to make a complete case for the adoption of such a course it is necessary to do three things:

1. To show that monetary manipulation will not accomplish what is claimed for it.
2. To show that a planned economy will not lead to the desired end. And
3. To define clearly what the third course is and why it is desirable.

Last March I finished a book, which was published in May, the purpose of which was to tackle the first of the three objectives just stated. In this book I tried to reduce to plain everyday language what our money mechanism is, what functions it can and cannot be expected to perform, where it has broken down and should be improved, and what are the basic fallacies that seem to me to underlie the Administration's monetary thinking.

When I wrote the book I had great misgivings as to whether much could be accomplished by so doing—not because I doubted, as many do, the interest of the average man and woman in these matters, but because I greatly distrusted my own ability to present the case with sufficient clarity and simplicity. The interest aroused by The Money Muddle and the generous reception accorded it by the public and by the press throughout the country have encouraged me to try my hand at a second and more difficult venture; namely, to show that a planned economy is undesirable, and to outline the elements of a course that does seem to me desirable as an alternative to the present conflicting tendencies.

Obviously this is a difficult task, and it is one which I approach with the full realization that it is a task which can be accomplished by no one person. The most I can hope is that I may stimulate the constructive thinking of others who may be better qualified and whose vision may carry further than mine.

In my first book I consciously exposed myself to the charge of over-simplification for the sake of clarity. The criticism for which I was prepared on this score was far more kindly than I had anticipated. I shall expose myself to the same charge again, for, if I can make any contribution to present thought, it is not as a profound scholar, but rather as one who seeks to think practically and to express his thoughts in plain language.

FOREWORD

xiii

New York City

July 4, 1934

Acknowledgment

The author wishes to make the following grateful acknowledgments:

To Senator Key Pittman for permission to reprint his article.

To Colonel Frank Knox and the Chicago Daily News for permission to reprint Colonel Knox's editorials.

And to a number of friends and associates for much helpful criticism and constructive suggestion in the preparation of this book.

Contents

I.	East on One Foot, West on the Other	3
II.	Choose Your Ism Now	10
III.	Senator Pittman Answers	23
IV.	The Answer Analyzed	40
V.	The Price of Planned Economy Abroad	60
VI.	"What Liberties Have You Lost?"	86
VII.	What, Then, Should We Conclude?	97
VIII.	If Not Inflation or Planned Economy— Then What?	108
IX.	Let's Be Specific—Where We Can	117
X.	It's Up To You and Me	166

APPENDIX

A.	Against Inflation	181
B.	What Injustice?	187
C.	Banking As A Profession	196

CHAPTER I

East on One Foot, West on the Other

The New Deal is trying to create a calf with five legs.

This is not because there are people in Washington who are trying to foist one thing or another upon the country—there are such people, but they checkmate each other and more or less cancel out each other's efforts. It is because we, the American people, have demanded of our Government a calf with five legs. And it is because our Government is not following any one definite policy, except the policy of trying to give every one at least a little of what he wants—or what it thinks he wants.

In a sense that is just what a democratic government is supposed to do, and therefore it is so important that we should make up our minds what it is that we want, and—more important still—whether we want what we are getting.

In another sense, however, even a democratic government is supposed to lead rather than follow, at least to the extent of formulating out of the composite desires of the people a single consistent purpose and policy.

In this respect it seems to me that the New Deal has not as yet been very successful. It has listened to a great number of conflicting desires and theories. It has attempted to give as much satisfaction as possible to all. It has furnished spiritual inspiration, a will to win, and a hope for a more abundant life in the future. But it has failed so far to weave out of the composite desires of the people any clear concept of what the goal is for which we are striving, or how we are to attain it.

Through his own confidence and courage President Roosevelt has united the people in a common desire to achieve recovery and to prevent by measures of reform the recurrence of recent painful experience. But he has defined neither "recovery" nor "reform."

"Recovery" means to get back something that you have had and lost. When you "recover" your health, you throw off illness and regain your previous condition of well-being. But, most emphatically, the New Deal does not want "recovery" in that sense. We are not only to get well, but to get well in such a way that we shall not be taken sick again.

Now it seems to me that there are two ways of going about such a purpose: either you say: "First I must get well—that is, recover—and then I shall see what I can do to live more sensibly so as to avoid getting ill again," or you say: "If I don't reform while I feel sick, I'll never get around to doing it once I feel all right again."

The New Deal has chosen the second method. It may be wise in so doing. But the danger of the second method is that you have to perform your operations on a patient weakened by long illness, and that you must constantly administer drugs to keep him alive while you are taking out and putting back his organs.

It may well be that, if we were to bend all our efforts towards "recovery," leaving "reform" to a later date, we should again become smug and stupidly satisfied with outworn systems and codes of social and economic behavior. One look at our hybrid and superannuated banking system affords convincing grounds for that fear. I for one have no quarrel with the New Deal for attempting the difficult task of bringing about recovery and reform simultaneously. Nor have I any quarrel with the basic intentions—if I understand them correctly—of most of the New Deal reforms.

But reform should, I think, be calmly and unemotionally conceived in order to be effective, even though history shows that it rarely is so conceived. In spite of historical precedent one cannot help regretting the hasty and experimental nature of the New Deal reforms and the atmosphere of somewhat fanatical punitive righteousness in which they have been incubated. One cannot help feeling that a measure of basic and permanent economic importance should be subjected to every possible test of criticism, and that it should never be rushed through the legislative machinery as an emergency action.

To reform is to re-make, and it stands to reason that an economic structure cannot be re-made in a spirit of hastily putting out a fire, lynching the fellow that started it—or is supposed to have started it—and then passing a law to prohibit the use of matches.

That, to a certain extent, is what the New Deal reforms have been like. But that is not where the greatest danger lies.

In time, hasty and ill-considered action can and will be rectified. We have already seen one such case of partial rectification in the amendment of the Securities Act of 1933.

The greatest danger, as I see it, lies in the inconsistencies and the generally unrealized implications of the so-called recovery measures.

It has been said that, faced with the actuality of "want in the midst of plenty," the New Deal set out to solve this vexing problem "by removing the plenty." That is what the agricultural program amounts to.

And, within the framework of this general agricultural policy, we are spending millions to raise farm prices by curtailing production, while at the same time we are spending other millions in reclaiming waste land for agricultural purposes, making seed and crop loans to farmers, and on other methods of improving and stimulating production of agricultural products.

I have dealt with our monetary policies in my previous book. Boiled down, they amount to an attempt to raise prices and "lighten the burden of debt" by debasing the purchasing power of the dollar—an attempt to redistribute wealth by destroying it. For the benefit of the reader who has not read The Money Muddle I have put in the Appendix, page 181, a few categorical statements in support of this general conclusion.

Again, the industrial recovery program, as expressed in the workings of the N.R.A., is in many respects flatly contradictory to the agricultural program, and likewise at cross purposes with the monetary policy. In fact, the National Recovery Act has now been recognized as a measure which is not a recovery measure at all, but a measure of reform.

Starting out as a measure of relief to spread work and relieve the dole, the N.R.A. became enlarged to a recovery measure in an effort to distribute purchasing power through increased wages and to relieve the disaster of competition through suspension of the anti-trust laws. As it subsequently developed, the N.R.A. became a threat of a permanent bureaucratic and Government-controlled program, cutting straight across our Constitution and laws as an instrument of reform.

As a recovery measure the N.R.A. has failed to accomplish its primary purpose—that is, to produce industrial re-employment on a large scale; it has improved conditions in a few industries, chiefly those which manufacture goods for immediate consumption, such as food or textiles; it has failed completely to stimulate the activity of the durable goods industries (such as building industries or machinery), in which we have the greatest part of our unemployment problem. On the other hand it has largely offset, by raising the prices of manufactured goods, the temporary advantage gained by the farmer through the monetary and agricultural programs. And it has obstructed recovery by adding to the elements of monetary uncertainty the threat of labor troubles and Government interference with business management. These latter elements of uncertainty arise from the reform features of the N.R.A.

As a measure of reform, dealing with an attempt to establish more equitable relations between industry, labor, and the consumer, the N.R.A. must be considered good or bad according to one's general philosophy of government and economy. Certainly it is a step towards planned economy. If we want a planned economy, well and good. If not, the sooner we do away with N.R.A. the better.

But that is perhaps getting ahead of our story.

We have been dealing here with the inconsistencies of the recovery program, which are important, but not nearly so important as the unrealized implications of some of these measures. Inconsistencies will in time iron themselves out, although the process may be a costly one. But the hidden tendencies of the New Deal—tendencies which I, for one, believe are largely involuntary—will not iron themselves out. On the contrary, they will, unless realized and counteracted, take root more and more deeply in our political, economic, and social structure.

Last spring, when I had just finished my first book, a group of us were sitting around talking along these lines. One of the group was Mr. Edwin Balmer, the editor of the Redbook Magazine.

Mr. Balmer asked me whether I intended to go on from where The Money Muddle left off. I said that I wanted to go on to discuss what seemed to me the basic question confronting the American people, but that I was not at all sure I could.

"And what," he said, "is the basic question?"

"A choice," I replied, "between freedom and an attempt at security."

That, as you can imagine, led to a discussion of what was meant by "freedom," what was meant by "security," whether there was any such thing as either, and so forth. Eventually it led to my writing a piece for Mr. Balmer's magazine, which appeared in the July issue, and which had certain repercussions, on account of which I shall include it here.

As you will see, it deals with the unrealized implications of the New Deal.

CHAPTER II

Choose Your Ism Now

(Redbook, July 1934)

If you were to choose one hundred men at random out of a crowd watching a baseball game anywhere in the United States, and if you were to ask these one hundred men the simple question:

"Do you want to change our form of government, and have Socialism or Fascism or Communism?"

Probably ninety-nine out of those hundred men would answer: "No." Ninety-five probably would make it an emphatic "NO!"

But if you were to ask those same hundred men:

1. "Do you think the Government should take over the railroads?"

2. "Do you think the Government should take over the banking business?"

3. "Do you think the Government should fix wages and take care of the unemployed?"

A very much larger number—perhaps half—would answer: "Yes." They would not realize that if the Government were to do these things permanently, it would mean the adoption of one of the very "isms" to which most of them had expressed their opposition.

If this is true—and I think it is—it means, in plain English, that a large part of our population wants the substance of a thing, the label of which it denies.

Millions of people who would deny indignantly that they were Socialists, or Fascists, or Communists, would vote in favor of any number of alterations in our economic system—alterations which could only be made at the expense of giving up the basic ideas of democracy upon which this nation was founded, and upon which it has prospered—for, in spite of recent misfortunes, we have prospered.

It seems to me that there we have the nub of our whole present-day problem.

And now, for a little while, can't we sit down together and quietly discuss this matter? I know, in the clamor of voices, it is difficult to know what to believe; but it ought not to be difficult to understand, if we will be a little less emotional and really look at what is happening.

People must realize that there are certain things they cannot have under our present system of economy and government—and stop clamoring for them—or they must decide that what they want is a change in favor of a different system, an altogether different system, in which they would have to give up much of the freedom of effort, of speech, of thought, of education, and of faith which has been their heritage since the days of the Revolution.

That seems to me the basic question which must be answered. Instead of attempting to answer it, we are at present acting in some respects as if we had decided to abandon our present system, while in other respects we continue to affirm our desire to maintain it. Before pointing out the things that we are doing today, which seem to me to imply an abandonment of the established order, let me attempt to define briefly what I conceive the established order to be.

Our philosophy of government is based on Aristotle's definition of freedom, which was made over two thousand years ago. "Freedom," he said, "is to govern and to be governed."

The latter half of the definition, "to be governed," has been neglected in the recent past; we have erred on the side of giving too much liberty to the individual. The danger now seems to be that we may neglect the first half—namely, "to govern." We have considered that the freedom of the individual meant his right to govern himself, and have neglected the parallel necessity for his being governed in the interest of other individuals. Now, in our revulsion from one extreme, we are flirting with a change that lays stress upon government planning and regimentation to an extent where the individual will "be governed," but where he himself will do precious little "governing."

Our philosophy of economics seems to me to be based upon the same principle of freedom as our philosophy of government: men are to be free to make capital out of work and enterprise, without encroaching upon the similar right of others. That is what a capitalistic system is. In such a system it follows inevitably that, starting from scratch, the intelligent and industrious worker fares better than he who is stupid or lazy. It follows inevitably that the child of hard workers does not start from scratch with the child of lazy parents. In all likelihood the child of hard-working and industrious parents will have an inherited advantage in education, health, and spiritual background. In addition, there may be an actual accumulation of inherited capital.

Up to that point very few people find any fault with a capitalistic system.

The trouble begins when a man who is extraordinarily intelligent or exceptionally strong takes advantage of the relative weakness of others to give himself a position of undue power, and exercises that power for his own selfish ends. Perhaps you will say that if a man is "intelligent," he will not use his power for his own selfish ends. That is true; but I do not mean that sort of intelligence. I am speaking here merely of a man who is equipped by nature or environment with an exceptional degree of physical or intellectual strength.

The trouble continues and gets worse when such a man dies and leaves his power, in the shape of accumulated wealth or position, to a son who has neither the exceptional intelligence nor the strength to justify his having it, but who nevertheless seeks to use his inherited power for his own advantage. Then we have an obvious injustice—but not a defect in the capitalistic philosophy. We have a defect in the system used to carry out the philosophy. To my mind, it is simply the neglect of the second half of the definition; such a man needs “to be governed” more and “to govern” less. . . .

The essence of our present order is that men work, or take risks, or go without things they want, in order to acquire, in the end, something more than they had before. The thing they seek to acquire may be purely material—such as food for themselves and their families, a pair of shoes, or an easy-chair; it may be intellectual—such as a chance to acquire an education or to travel; it may be psychological—such as a sense of achievement to satisfy the creative impulse; it may be any one of many combinations of motive and desire; but the thing that makes men work is the hope of satisfying that desire. It is desire—which is not necessarily material—that makes the wheels go round in our present order.

When the desire to eat becomes the fear of not being able to eat, work tends to lose its voluntary quality and becomes toil.

Thus, so long as we have a capitalistic system, anything that dims the hope of reward reduces the willingness of men to work, reduces their willingness to suffer privation, and reduces their willingness to run risks. Anything that adds to the hope of reasonable gain stimulates effortful activity.

That seems to me the basis of our economic order. It follows that anything we do to obscure the hope of reward is an action tending towards the abandonment of our present system. We have, it seems to me, done several things that will, if continued, spell an abandonment of our present order and necessitate the adoption of one of the "isms":

1. We are pursuing a monetary policy which makes the future character and value of money a matter of conjecture rather than certainty. We have embarked upon a theory of depreciating the currency in order to raise prices, without defining how far we are prepared to go in this direction, and without any clearly stated objective. Our Government has indicated a belief in its ability to manage the price-level by means of arbitrarily raising and lowering the value of money.

When people begin to wonder about money, they wonder about the future value of wages and salaries, and they wonder whether it will be possible to make any profits. That reduces their willingness to work or take risks, and removes one of the main incentives towards saving.

2. We have been so shocked by our past experience with the investment market that in our anxiety to prevent its abuse we have practically destroyed it. That means that we have destroyed the mechanism by which in the past savings have found their way into employment in supplying the capital needs of business. As a result, business will have to go to the Government for capital, or else cut down its productive activity. If it goes to the Government for capital, we have Government in business, which is State Capitalism—one of the “isms.” If business cuts down its productive activity, our standard of living will be reduced.

3. We have begun to regulate industry to such an extent that it takes a soothsayer to forecast whether a given industry will be making sufficient profits next year to pay wages, let alone dividends.

4. We have begun to practice birth-control on the soil—paying agricultural producers to produce less, not to produce something else. If we keep on with that theory, we shall end up a long way from the basic idea of our present order.

5. We are embarked upon a program of Government expenditure which will impose a burden of taxation on future generations that can only be carried if Government expenditure is very soon supplanted by private expenditure. If the Government is to become the one great employer, we shall have abandoned our present order. If the Government is not to become the one great employer, private enterprise will have to be reborn; and it seems to me that private enterprise cannot be reborn in an atmosphere of Government regulation, and upon a basis of Government financing of capital requirements.

6. We are educating the individual and the banker and the farmer and the business corporation to take all troubles to Washington and lay them on the lap of the Government, instead of trying to solve them at home. That seems to me a philosophy based upon asking the Government to support us, as opposed to the philosophy of our supporting self-government.

These, I believe, are some of the things we are doing in the direction of a new "ism," without ever having faced the basic question of whether we really desire to abandon the system founded by our forefathers, in order to try a new experiment.

It is perfectly true that the system by which we sought to carry out our traditional philosophy is in need of overhauling; but it does not follow that our basic philosophy must be changed.

To meet abuse of the capitalistic philosophy, we have, among other things, graduated income-taxes, collective bargaining for labor, and laws against "combinations in restraint of trade." None of these devices is perfect. Our tax laws are partially ineffective—largely because of tax-exempt securities; our collective bargaining is partially ineffective—largely because neither employers nor labor leaders have learned that in the long run a policy of fairness is the only policy that pays, in wages or dividends; our anti-trust laws are partially ineffective—largely because they are too literal, and stand in the way of good as well as bad "combinations."

In fact, all our laws are too literal, and are taken too literally. As a nation we are amazingly skilful at circum-venting the spirit of our own rules while obeying the letter of them. And our courts have fostered this national habit. We go on the principle that anything not expressly prohibited is right, without stopping to consider whether we mean "right" for others to do to us, or only "right" for us to do to others. In that respect we are a very young nation.

We are very young also in another respect. If we pinch our fingers in a door, we fly into a rage—not at ourselves, but at the door, and then hurt our toes horribly in trying to kick down the door. Such a feeling is, of course, perfectly natural and human, but it is childish. The unfortunate thing about such childish feelings is that they constitute the easiest emotions upon which a demagogue can play. And we have our share of demagogues.

In our present state of civilization few men produce directly the things they want. Most of us can only attain our desires by exchanging our work for the work of others. We are all more or less specialized producers; and what we try to do is to produce something which a lot of other people want, because then we shall have no difficulty in disposing of our product.

The more human beings are able to produce for each other the things they desire, the more all men in the aggregate are able to satisfy their desires. In other words, the more productive activity increases, the higher will be the general standard of living—unless something goes wrong.

What usually goes wrong is a war, which completely throws out of balance the mechanism of demand and supply. A war stimulates overproduction of some things, kills the demand for others, changes the channels of trade, and changes the occupations and desires of people. Workmen become soldiers; women take the places of men at factory benches; and the whole machinery of production is changed to meet the emergency of national defense.

The result of war is untold destruction of property, and at the end the necessity for again readjusting our lives, desires, and occupations to peace. It is inevitable that for a time there will be too much production of some things and too little of others; that means a dislocated price-level, a dislocated wage-level, and general uncertainty whether there will be any reasonable reward for work.

When that happens, people begin to talk about the "breakdown of the capitalistic system." That is talking loosely.

What actually has happened—it has happened to us as well as to the rest of the world since the recent war—is that the stabilizer of the capitalistic system has got stuck. The mechanism of demand and supply, as expressed in prices and their effect upon production, has broken down. Normally, when prices of certain things fall, production of those things is cut down automatically. After a great upheaval this normal process is interfered with by the social consequences which it involves. The adjustment has become too hard to make, because it would involve throwing too many people out of one kind of work and into another.

Without wishing to be dogmatic, it seems to me that the answer is twofold:

1. We have outgrown and can no longer afford the senseless debauch of war. We have reached a stage of civilization where it is just as impossible to have our system function if from time to time nations are going to fall upon each other with intent to do physical violence as it is impossible for life in a community to go on if from time to time people were to decide to plunder each others' houses and murder the police.

2. Our demand-and-supply mechanism has become too rigid and too insensitive, so that rising or falling prices do not translate themselves quickly enough into increased or decreased production.

This is because our units of production are, broadly speaking, too large; our people are too incapable of doing more than one special thing; it has become too difficult to stop growing wheat and to grow spinach instead, or to stop making more shirts and make more shoes. Under our present-day specialized individual activity, it has become difficult to stop doing whatever one is doing and do something else. We go on making too many of the things whose falling prices long since have warned us to stop. Then, because we have been making these things at a loss, we go bankrupt—and are unable to make any of them. That is where we get into trouble.

In order to make our demand-and-supply mechanism again more sensitive to price-changes, it is perfectly true that we need more intelligent planning applied to our economic order; but it does not follow that such planning must be done by a central governmental authority, or that it cannot be done by the individual elements that compose the economic community.

So far as I know, we have not reached any decision to abandon the capitalistic system. Nevertheless, as I have pointed out, we are acting in many respects as if we had reached such a decision. Such things we must stop doing if we do not wish to go in for some form of planned economy, whether it be Communism, or Socialism, or Fascism.

On the other hand, if we are going in for a new order—an order in which the Government is to do the thinking, and the planning, and the paying—two things seem to me to be worthy of serious consideration:

1. It is relatively easy to give a government omnipotence. I know of no way to give it the omniscience it would require to make such omnipotence of any value—especially if it is a government that must submit itself once every few years to popular election. A government which depends for its existence upon popularity cannot, to my mind, be expected to pursue the clear, straight road of economic planning that any of the “isms” demand. It seems to me inevitable that if we are to abandon our economic order, we must be prepared to abandon our present form of government. Otherwise we shall have a "planned economy," the plan of which changes whenever a popular election approaches.

2. If the Government is to do the spending, there is only one way for it to get the money—by taxing the people. People can pay no taxes if they have no incomes. If the hope of reward for work or enterprise is to be removed as an incentive, something else will have to take its place, or we shall all be reduced to a dead level of common slavery. That "something else" could be a common will for mutual service without reward other than the greatest good for the greatest number.

But are we ready for that?

If we are, well and good. Let us then at least see our objective and strive for it.

If we are not ready for it, then let us stop wrecking what is left of the old order, and rebuild as best we can.

Let us face facts and not waste time with dreams.

Let us see if we cannot "be governed" without forgetting how "to govern" ourselves—without lying down and asking the Government, elected by us from among our own number, to accomplish feats of legerdemain that not one of us thinks he can perform himself.

Let us choose our "ism" and stick to it!

Senator Pittman Answers

If I were trying to make a reputation as an author, I should certainly hesitate to include in this book two articles that had been previously published in a magazine. For one thing, it looks like a lazy man's device, and, for another, it disturbs somewhat the unity of a book. But I am not attempting to establish a literary reputation. My efforts may quite properly be classified as pamphleteering, for I am concerned with only one thing; namely, to drive home a message. For this reason I shall not hesitate to lay myself open to criticism along the lines of literary tradition.

The article "Choose Your Ism Now," which I have just reproduced in the preceding chapter, was answered in the succeeding issue of the same magazine; it is the origin of this answer, just as much as its substance, which leads me to include it here. Let me tell you a little about its origin.

Hardly had I turned in the manuscript of "Choose Your Ism Now," when the enterprising editor of the Redbook informed me that he had sent it down to the President's Secretary, Mr. Louis McHenry Howe, along with the suggestion that perhaps Mr. Howe would like to answer it.

A week or so later Mr. Balmer went to Washington, and shortly after that he sent me the manuscript of an article by Senator Key Pittman, which appeared under the caption: "The Golden Rule Is America's Ism."

Were I a real pamphleteer at heart, I suppose I should quote from this article only such passages as best suited my purpose, but I think it is fairer to print it in full, and let the reader draw his or her own conclusions.

You will note that certain passages are italicized. These underlinings are mine—not the Senator's. They serve a purpose that will become evident at the end of this chapter.

THE GOLDEN RULE IS AMERICA'S ISM

BY SENATOR KEY PITTMAN

(Redbook, August 1934)

If I were to go to the same ball-game that Mr. Warburg speaks of in the introduction to his article which appeared in the last issue of Redbook, and choose one hundred men of the crowd at random, and ask these one hundred men the simple question,

"Do you want to change our form of government and have Socialism or Fascism or Communism?"

In my opinion, the hundred men would turn back to watch the ball-game, saying:

"What do these theoretical questions have to do with the practical matters that affect our daily lives? Ask us something really important."

Then, after watching the game awhile in their fashion, probably ninety-five would turn around and say:

"If by these questions you mean that we are doctrinaire and want to go to the extreme of any one of these ideas, the way that some governments have done, our answer is no. But if you mean that by calling a thing Socialism or Fascism or Communism you are going to scare us away from practical and necessary changes in our existing system, our answer is that when putting such a question to us, you are trying to confuse the issue. We suspect you do not want us to come to grips as individuals with the things that will better ourselves; you want us to surrender to you, or to some one else like you, the problem of deciding specific questions and specific human needs, instead of having us do it in our own democratic way."

But if, following Mr. Warburg's dialectic method, I should return to these one hundred men and ask them the following questions, they would probably in each case answer in terms of the conditions and necessities that their knowledge of each individual situation justifies. I may add, without attempting to disparage Mr. Warburg, that I am enough of an old-fashioned Democrat to believe that I would get more wisdom from their answers than I would from a hundred men like Mr. Warburg, who, great in technical knowledge, are so wedded to the hard dogmatic and selfish theory in which their training has nurtured them, that their minds turn to confusing and deceptive theories rather than to specific wrongs and specific remedies.

I believe that our citizens are our government, and that officers are but their agents. I hold that sound control over the issue, circulation and safeguarding of money is a government function, and is essential to the existence of democracy. If bankers, through private initiative as an agency to aid in the performance of such functions, utterly failed to satisfy the requirements, as they have, and admittedly so in the recent past, and continued impotent, then the Government would be compelled to take over in toto the functions of banking, and such an act would not be destructive to our form of government, but on the contrary would be an act of preservation.

In short, I am a believer in the wisdom of the average man, because I am a believer in fundamental old-fashioned American doctrine. I would like, therefore, to put to the hundred men the following questions, and indicate what, in my judgment, their answers would be. When they have answered the following questions, I would then point out to them and to Mr. Warburg certain essential facts which distinguish the country which these questions and answers would describe. At the very end, it would not be necessary for me to discuss with them further the bugaboos raised by Mr. Warburg, because the entire reality of these bugaboos would be dissipated in the clear air of common sense.

So let us be on our way, and despite the fact that these one hundred men have paid their money to see a ball-game, set them the task of thinking a little about some things that have affected their ability to go to ball-games at all.

My questions would be:

1. "If conditions in the railroad business, and in finance and business generally, have brought the railroads to a point where there was grave danger of their becoming bankrupt; and if the owners and managers of these railroads were to come to the President of the United States and say that they had found it impossible by private action to effect the economies that they needed, and they were unable to borrow money to meet their debt charges and their deficits; and if they asked the President to lend them money out of the great credit of the United States, and also to give them the machinery necessary to effect their economics—what would you, as a citizen, want the President to do?"

The citizens would answer, I believe, that transportation is an essential of commerce; that the free, expeditious and economic flow of commerce is absolutely necessary to the maintenance of the highest standard of development and prosperity established by our citizens; that railroads are therefore public utilities, and if they are unwilling or unable to perform properly such functions, then it is the duty of the Government to take over such functions, and such act would not destroy our form of government, but would preserve it; that the President ought to talk to the owners of the railroads and then to the holders of railroad securities and to representatives of the men who work on railroads; and that he ought then to turn to the great Interstate Commerce Commission, now successfully operating for forty-five years, and see if he could find some one to help the railroads out of their difficulties by helping them agree on economies.

The citizens would probably add that the President should then see whether the United States could afford to lend certain railroads the money to save them from the excessive costs of bankruptcy (wherever possible), particularly those railroads which were so badly organized and operated through private efforts that it appeared impossible to save them. He should then make sure that the reorganization of the roads would be worked out to the satisfaction of all those concerned—owners, managers, workers and creditors.

I think that the citizens would say that they feel that the President did just this thing in a sensible way, and that it has been a satisfactory operation.

2. "If conditions in the field of banking had reached such a serious pass that banks were closing all over the country, and that in order to save the rest of the banks many States were declaring bank holidays; and if wise men in the field of banking came to the President and said that they felt he ought to exercise power to close them all, in order to protect the savings of the people while there was worked out a single comprehensive plan for all banks in the country—what should the President do? Should he perchance tell these people that it is wrong for the public to come to Washington every time they are in trouble, that they ought to go home and work out their own salvation, that the things they are asking for are altogether too great an extension of the power of the federal executive, and that such an extension would not be approved by the bankers of this country?"

I believe that the citizens would answer that no real American vested with authority is in the habit of avoiding that authority by any cowardly passing of the buck in the name of some theoretic objective. The President would have said: "I am a practical man. I believe the people trust me, and I am going to do what seems to be wise, particularly inasmuch as the bankers themselves and the people seem to have agreed that I am the only authority in the country able to solve this problem." I believe the one hundred citizens would say that judging by what they saw happen in the past years, a pretty sensible course was followed, and that they certainly felt that the actions taken saved serious public disorders, perhaps a revolution, and that the test that he made showed what a democratic country could do in an emergency.

3. "If the business of agriculture throughout the country had become so depressed because of low prices that the farmer was reduced to a state of poverty and need such as the country had never seen before; and if the leaders of agricultural societies and organizations, the Senators and Representatives elected by farming communities, and other experts, had made it clear that the depression of prices was caused by the production of more agricultural commodities than could be consumed and exported, and that a method had been finally agreed upon among farm leaders to reduce this surplus; and if they had asked the President for a trial of this plan, what should the President do?"

I believe that the answer would be that a people's President would give this plan a chance. He would not condemn it out of hand. He would give it a fair trial; and if it did not work, he would come back and tell the people, and they would try another plan, always agreeing that what they want to do is to raise the prices of farm products. I believe further that the one hundred citizens would say that as they understood it, the President had done just that, and that they were confident that on the basis of the common sense he had shown in meeting the situation without evading it, he would use the same common sense in continuing to work toward the solution of the problem.

4. "If it became apparent that unemployment in the industries of the country might become so serious as to threaten to strain the resources of the country in extending direct relief, and if there appeared to be a process, by a wise system of co-operation between business and government, by which certain of the rigors of the anti-trust laws might be suspended, provided industry would work together to secure employment and to eliminate the wastes attendant upon unrestricted competition, what, in your opinion, should the President do?"

I believe that the citizens would answer, as I think Mr. Warburg would have answered at the time, that with due consideration of all the interests involved, business would be helped in the working out of such a plan. I believe the answer would be that, considering the origins and support that the N.R.A. had, and considering the disposition on the part of most of those individuals that have profited by it and want to retain their codes, and considering the disposition of labor to recognize that they have gained certain rights for which they have fought for many years, and considering that great social objectives such as the abolition of child labor have been attained—the citizens would say that those business men and others who asked the President to establish such a method of co-operation were wise, and the President wise in listening to them.

5. "Do you as average citizens of the United States feel that because of the monetary policies of the President, you have been deprived of one of the main incentives toward saving? If so, how do you explain the tremendous interest which you have manifested in your life-insurance policies in the last few months? Why have you been putting more money into savings-banks? Why have you been so willing to go back to work when work has been offered to you? Do you see anything wrong with the policy of the President in going off the gold standard when that act became necessary, and of attempting to restore prices through a managed currency?"

I believe that the answer of these average citizens would be that the President, on the basis of his record, can be trusted to avoid the dangers of inflation. This record has been a stout resistance to unwise inflationary methods, and a willingness to recognize the need of curing the injustices occasioned by a rapid deflation in the circulating currency and credit of the country, by definite methods to check the deflation and restore monetary conditions in relation to the prices of commodities. Any one of these citizens who borrowed money from Mr. Warburg's bank ten years ago on the basis of currency which in relation to debts and purchasing power has since shrunk to one-half its value, and finds that it now takes nearly twice as much of his products and labor to pay such loans as it did when the loan was made, is hardly disposed to agree with Mr. Warburg's monetary ideas.

6. "Do you as citizens object to the stimulation of employment through public works to the limited extent that has been authorized, or to the relief of suffering, or to the Civil Works Administration, or to the Civilian Conservation Corps? Realizing, as you do, that the Federal Government was the only agency able to assume these burdens, do you think that our assumption of them involves any disposition, as Mr. Warburg says, 'to abandon our present order'?"

I think the average man of common sense would answer that this assumption of responsibilities by borrowing money from those willing to lend it, in order to carry other people through an emergency, is no more than the average man does in his daily life over and over again. It has nothing to do with changing the present order, or any other order. In fact, if the word order would be used at all, it would be in the sense that we have spent money to maintain order, to protect human lives, and to guard against revolution. Mr. Warburg is forgetting that Americans are people who are disposed to help those in need even to the extent of using their resources to do it. Perhaps Mr. Warburg would call the Golden Rule an "ism."

7. "Do you average citizens feel that the people of the United States would have surrendered their independence and capacity of self-support and self-government by asking Mr. Warburg to do these various things?"

I believe the average man would answer that he knows as a fact that for many generations certain business interests have been in the habit of coming to Washington very frequently for all sorts of reasons, and in most administrations they have not gone away empty-handed. These average citizens would be able to say further that they are glad to have an administration in Washington to which all sorts of people can look for sympathetic help and understanding; that they are glad to feel that such sympathetic help and understanding does not mean the end of personal initiative. I think that they would say further that there has been no disposition on the part of the Wall Street fraternity of which Mr. Warburg is a member, to lose any of its initiative or active individuality even after a hundred years of coming to Washington for help; and that the average man is willing to take a chance with the theoretical considerations of his self-sufficiency if he knows that he has a people's government.

8. "Do you as average American citizens know of any reason to indicate that you are losing your power to govern yourself? Have you heard of any disposition to take away your power, your right to vote, your control over your public officials from high to low? Have you heard of any newspaper being suppressed by the Government, as in other countries? Have you heard of any suggestion to abolish Congress, State legislatures, courts, or any other fundamental parts of the Government? Have you heard of any suggestions to amend the Constitution?"

I believe that the average American would answer these questions in the negative except for the last one.

He would perhaps answer: "Oh yes, I have heard of two attempts that the Administration is making to change the Constitution, and I am mighty well pleased with them. The first has already been accomplished—the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment; the other—a constitutional amendment to abolish child labor. If you do that kind of changing of the Constitution, you can count us for it one hundred per cent." The citizens would probably further answer: "Well, Mr. Warburg, if there is any change in our system and form of government, then you and others like you who have been intrusted with great authority and power must bear the sole responsibility by reason of your failure to administer that trust fairly and efficiently. And now go away and let us watch the ball-game. . . . You know, we didn't have the price of admission a year ago."

And now we come to the significance of the italicized passages.

Bearing in mind that Senator Pittman's article was written in late May, it is interesting to note certain phrases in it, which bear a striking resemblance to certain other phrases that occurred a month later in the President's radio address of June 28, 1934.

I refer in particular to the following:

"Have you as an individual paid too high a price for these gains? Plausible self-seekers and theoretical die-hards will tell you of the loss of individual liberty. . . . Have you lost any of your rights or liberty or constitutional freedom of action and choice? . . .”

“In other words it is not the overwhelming majority of the farmers or manufacturers or workers who deny the substantial gains of the past year. The most vociferous of the Doubting Thomases may be divided roughly into two groups:

“First, those who seek special political privilege, and, second, those who seek special financial privilege. . . .”

“A few timid people, who fear progress, will try to give you new and strange names for what we are doing. Sometimes they will call it ‘Fascism,’ sometimes ‘Communism,’ sometimes ‘Regimentation,’ sometimes ‘Socialism.’ But in so doing they are trying to make very complex and theoretical something that is really very simple and practical. . . .”

Do you see what I mean?

Does it not seem to you, as it seems to me, that it is fair to assume that Senator Pittman’s article was written after a certain amount of discussion in Washington, and that it may be taken as at least an indirect reflection of the Administration’s point of view?

That is why I think it merits more than a casual reading, especially in these days when we have so little in the way of official utterance to go by.

That is why I shall now analyze Senator Pittman's article and seek to answer it.

It seems to me that when a man responds to a straightforward argument on one side of a debatable subject by insinuations which attempt to discredit his opponent rather than by meeting the argument on its own ground, that man confesses to the weakness of his case.

Senator Pittman has chosen a method with which the New Deal has made us all too familiar.

It is not a new method, nor is its present-day use confined to the New Dealers in this country. Those who criticize the New Deal are "Tories," "Doubting Thomases," and "political or financial self-seekers," or else they are just "die-hard theorists." Those who criticize the Hitler régime in Germany are grumblers, carpers, and other less polite terms. I am not familiar with the Russian or Italian terminology, but I dare say it is much the same.

Nor is the disparagement of an opponent in the public mind a difficult thing to accomplish—particularly today in this country, if the opponent happens to be a Wall Street banker. That alone is enough reason for the Senator to say:

"Pay no attention to this fellow. He is 'wedded to the hard, dogmatic, and selfish theory in which his training has nurtured him.' He is thinking only of his own interests and those of his kind."

It is inconceivable to the Senator that there should be Wall Street bankers who are other than hard and selfish—inconceivable that there may perhaps be among them men whose fathers and grandfathers and great-grandfathers were not only honorable bankers and conscientious citizens, but men who founded and maintained schools, hospitals, and institutions in furtherance of art and science.

“Perhaps Mr. Warburg would call the Golden Rule an ‘ism’,” says the Senator. Perhaps the Senator did not read the article to which he made his “reply.” Or perhaps he sincerely believes that only politicians do unto others as they would be done by, and that when someone who has not the virtue of being either penniless or a politician seeks honestly to perform the duties of democratic citizenship, he must of necessity be suspected of ignorance or self-interest. Ah well, let it go.

This sort of thing is only important because it is a typical New Deal reaction to criticism.

It would be all too easy to turn the guns of this kind of warfare upon the politicians, but I think we can safely leave them to do that to each other. It is only the substance, if any, of the “reply” that concerns us here.

I say “if any,” because so much of Senator Pittman’s article is devoted to making me appear a selfish reactionary and to answering things that I did not say. For example:

Senator Pittman devotes several paragraphs to a defense of what the President has done about the railroads.

I did not attack it.

There are only a few hard tufts of grass to furnish a foothold in the soft swamp of evasive generalities—but they are significant tufts just the same.

Let us see what we can make of them.

CHAPTER IV

The Answer Analyzed

I. CONCERNING THE FARMER

Senator Pittman defends the agricultural program on the ground that it was a plan "agreed upon among farm leaders" and demanded by the Senators and Representatives elected by the farming communities. Therefore, he says, the President rightly gave it a trial.

I doubt whether many of the Senators and Representatives who voted for the farm legislation a year ago had fully read or understood the Agricultural Bill when they voted upon it.

I doubt whether half the farmers in the country fully understand it today. What they understand is that they have received certain cash payments for not growing crops—or, rather, for planting less acreage—for killing little pigs, and so forth. What they do not understand is that these cash payments cannot go on forever, and that, when they stop, the farmers may be worse off than they were before—not only as farmers, but as human beings who have lost their birthright of freedom.

More and more the farmers are beginning to realize this themselves. More still they will realize it when a few of the Southern cotton-growers have been fined or sent to jail under the terms of the Bankhead Bill, for growing more than their allotted quantity of cotton—when they realize that they have permanently lost a large part of their foreign market because our Government has deliberately stimulated the planting of cotton in foreign countries.

The American farmer is not a Russian peasant. It will not take him long to realize the absurdity of trying to get rich by destroying wealth and reducing the production of wealth. It will not take him long to resent a government-planned economy, under which he is told what he may grow, how much he may grow, and where he may grow it.

And how will the American taxpayer like paying the army of enforcement officers that such a system will require?

My answer to Senator Pittman is this:

I don't believe that a majority of the American farmers wanted or, for that matter, had ever thought of such a plan. All they wanted was relief from intolerable distress. That they are entitled to, and can only get by a consistent rounded-out program of reconstruction based on private enterprise—a program which must involve a realistic attitude on the part of our Government with regard to foreign trade.

That they can never get by inflation, or, as I have previously said, by spending the people's money to practice birth-control on the soil, while other nations take our former markets.

II. CONCERNING INDUSTRY

The Senator defends the origin and conception of the N.R.A. on much the same lines as he defends the agricultural program; that is, that business leaders wanted it. He says also:

“. . . the citizen would answer, as I think Mr. Warburg would have answered at the time . . . that those business men and others, who asked the President to establish such a method of co-operation were wise, and the President wise in listening to them.”

Now, as a matter of record (which is unimportant), I favored, and pleaded in March and April 1933, for quite a different kind of recovery act—an act which would have had in it no bureaucratic Government control and regulation of industry, and which would have concentrated its efforts on stimulating the “durable goods industries.” Senator Wagner and Senator LaFollette would doubtless remember our conversations on the subject. Raymond Moley not only knew my views, but apparently shared them at the time.

Furthermore I opposed the licensing feature and article 7a (the labor union clause) of the N.I.R.A. when I first heard them discussed.

And, finally, I did not attack in my article, to which the Senator makes his “reply,” the origin or basic conception of the law, which the Senator seeks to defend. I attacked the way in which it has been administered. For this the Senator has apparently no defense—at least he makes none.

I have attacked the basic concept of the law in the first chapter of this book, and I shall attack it further shortly, but first let us deal with the Senator's defense of its origin.

He says that business leaders wanted it. Undoubtedly some of them did. Undoubtedly others wanted the Government to do something, but not necessarily what it did do under N.R.A. And undoubtedly there were a great number of business men who would have greatly preferred no government interference at all.

Undoubtedly also the American Federation of Labor wanted compulsory recognition, but that does not mean that the ninety per cent of American laborers who did not belong to the A. F. of L. wanted such forced recognition. Or that they would want it today.

I cannot agree with Senator Pittman's premise.

If I grant his premise and assume that a majority of business men and a majority of laboring men wanted the N.R.A.—which is, I believe, an entirely unwarranted assumption—then I agree even less with Senator Pittman's conclusion from his premise.

You don't give a man with a stomach-ache whatever medicine he happens to ask for—that is, not if you are a good doctor.

And even if you are only a druggist—which is perhaps more what a democratic government is supposed to be than a doctor—you don't sell him a medicine that contains arsenic in large quantity, if you know your business.

How many of the business leaders who wanted an N.R.A. now like what they have got? How do consumers, particularly farmers, like it?

Granted that it has put millions of men and women back to work in the "consumers' goods industries," how many has it thrown out of work or prevented from finding employment in the "durable goods industries," by discouraging and in some codes even prohibiting replacement of machinery?

To what extent has it sown the seeds of future labor trouble?

How much has the N.R.A. really done to eliminate unfair practice, and how much has it increased monopolistic exploitation by big business at the expense of small business and at the expense of the consumer?

We hear a great deal about the elimination of child labor, that being the most vaunted accomplishment of the N.R.A. The fact is that the Child Labor Movement had previously removed from work some two millions of children, and that the N.R.A. has merely removed another seventy thousand.

The fact is that the N.R.A. has arbitrarily set out to ordain higher wages and shorter hours upon all industry without due regard to the particular conditions prevailing in any given industry.

The fact is that it raised wages and hence prices of manufactured goods on the theory that the greater purchasing power in the hands of labor would increase the volume of business, without regard to the fact that in some industries volume would have to fall off if prices were raised.

The fact is that as a recovery measure the National Recovery Act, though it has done much good in certain industries, has, considering industry as a whole, been a dismal failure. But that is not the basic question.

The basic question is not whether the majority of business men wanted an N.R.A. as a help towards recovery, or whether it has turned out to be a help towards recovery. The basic question is whether American business ever wanted or wants now to be run by a permanent Government bureaucracy.

It would have been one thing to vest discretionary and dictatorial power over business in a highly efficient Civil Service bureaucracy, operating in accordance with laws enforced by the courts. That would still mean planned economy and the end of a democratic free people, but at least it might preserve some semblance of individual liberty. But the bureaucracy of the N.R.A. is not elected by the people, nor is it selected from any Civil Service list. It is a body of men selected from on high—and this is no criticism of these men—a body of men appointed by or through the authority of the President, and responsible solely to him.

This body of men can make rules and regulations which cut straight across existing laws, rights, and privileges. And this same body of men is the sole court of appeal to which business may have recourse for relief from such rules or regulations.

Whatever the American business man and the American laborer may have wanted by way of emergency help in order to get started again, back in the despairing days of early 1933, I am convinced that he did not want to set up a permanent dictatorial power designed to override not only the laws laid down by the Constitution but the laws of nature, which have defied all mortal assault since the world was created.

I am convinced that he had no idea of emulating those experiments across the water about which I shall have more to say in a later chapter.

All I said in my article was: "We have begun to regulate industry to such an extent that it takes a soothsayer to forecast whether a given industry will be making sufficient profits next year to pay wages, let alone dividends." And now I have said a good deal more.

In a word, I say that the N.R.A. is strangling private enterprise in business, to which Senator Pittman makes no answer whatsoever, possibly because he knows that, in spite of protestations to the contrary, the N.R.A. has for several months been in the process of retreat.

III. CONCERNING BANKING

In his series of questions to the hypothetical citizen, the Senator, under question two, definitely defends, so far as I can see, only the closing of all the banks in March 1933—which I have never attacked. Then he somewhat vaguely gives his blessing to all the Administration's subsequent acts in the banking field, and says nothing about the things that were left undone.

I have attacked the Administration's banking policies specifically and definitely—not so much in the article "Choose Your Ism Now," as in The Money Muddle. Had the Senator read this book, of which I sent him an advance copy as a souvenir of our last summer's London adventure, I doubt whether he himself would think that he made much of a defense.

It is not enough to say that there was an emergency in March 1933 and that something had to be done. That is admitted.

It is not enough to say that our banking system had failed. That, too, is evident to every man, woman, and child.

What I have repeatedly contended is:

1. That we need a real reform of our banking system, which we have not had, and should have had by this time.

2. That we need a banking system operated by private enterprise under strictly enforced, intelligent, and uniform laws.

3. That we are on the road towards a socialized and politically controlled banking system, which is inconsistent with our form of political and economic life.

4. That we need bankers with the professional viewpoint of the doctor, and not the self-seeking viewpoint of the money-lender and gambler, nor the equally self-seeking and less intelligent viewpoint of the political appointee.

5. That our present tendency is to drive out the many good bankers along with the bad, and leave the field to a politically controlled bureaucracy.

That is what I have said about banking, and it cannot be answered by talking about past emergencies or failures of past leaders.

The banking system failed because it was a bad system.

The banking system failed because it was expected to withstand the strain of an orgy of national speculation and stupid Government policy, under which even a good banking system would have broken down.

The banking system failed because our bankers were not as a whole properly trained for their jobs.

All these things are the fault of the people as a whole, the fault of the Government, the fault of each and every one of us, just as much as they are the fault of the much-abused bankers.

In two sentences, which for some reason are not under the heading of his second question, but which are in the general introduction to his article, Senator Pittman gives the show away. I shall repeat them here:

"I hold that sound control over the issue, circulation and safeguarding of money is a government function, and is essential to the existence of democracy. If bankers, through private initiative as an agency to aid in the performance of such functions, utterly failed to satisfy the requirements, as they have, and admittedly so in the recent past, and continued impotent, then the Government would be compelled to take over in toto the functions of banking, and such an act would not be destructive to our form of government, but on the contrary would be an act of preservation."

Senator Pittman believes in a Government-controlled and operated banking system. Bankers, he thinks, have shown themselves unworthy of the trust.

When Senator Pittman makes this statement he answers a question which the Administration has so far refused to answer. If the Administration agrees with Senator Pittman, and if it intends to establish Government control of the banking machinery, why not say so and set about doing it?

If the Administration does not want to set up Government banking, why not say that, and set about reforming the private banking system so that it can work?

At the present time we have an ancient and outworn system of banks operating under forty-nine different laws and authorities. In addition we have the Government heavily interested in the capital of some six thousand banks; and we have overhanging us a so-called permanent guarantee of deposits, which is scheduled to go into effect on July 1, 1935, and which, when it goes into effect, will make all banks liable without limit for each other.

One can feel as Senator Pittman feels, that banking should be taken over in toto by the State.

One can feel as I feel, that banking should remain a matter of private initiative and capital, but that the banking laws should be revised and modernized, and that bankers should be properly trained. One can feel, as I feel, that if banking becomes a Government function, industry too will become a Government function, and that political control of banking and industry would be a catastrophe. I shall develop this later.

But it is difficult to see how one can straddle between those two points of view. That is what the Administration is doing so far.

Concerning another phase of banking—namely, the investment machinery—Senator Pittman remains completely silent.

It is true enough that the Securities Act has been amended in such a way that it will probably no longer act as a complete dam to the free flow of savings into employment in providing the capital needs of business.

The fact remains, however, that it is still far from an ideal piece of legislation, that it will still stand in the way of much legitimate financing, and that the "durable goods industries" cannot revive without adequate financing.

The fact remains that over sixty per cent of our unemployed are in these "durable goods industries," and that, if private capital is not encouraged to supply the need, Government funds must take its place—which means more Government expenditure and eventual Government control of the "durable goods industries." That, I think, even Senator Pittman would be prepared to recognize as a considerable departure from the established American order.

IV. CONCERNING MONEY

Senator Pittman disposes of the whole question of monetary policy by declaring his belief that the average citizen would think "that the President can be trusted to avoid the dangers of inflation on the basis of his record." With that single statement he tries to make the reader reduce the whole matter to one of personal confidence in the integrity of the President.

It is not a question of trusting the President. No one trusts more than I the integrity of his purpose. If the issue rested in his hands alone—if he were not besieged by money-doctors and by all forms of inflationists within and without Congress—there would be little ultimate danger, even though "the record" to which Senator Pittman refers is not an altogether reassuring one.

But the issue does not rest in his hands alone, largely because he believes in compromising rather than in asserting an unequivocal leadership, and because Congress has become accustomed to this fact. Only recently we have seen Congress override one half-hearted veto. Only recently, as no one knows better than Senator Pittman, we have seen another compromise with the ever-active silver-tongued descendants of William Jennings Bryan. One compromise usually begets another.

If the average citizen understood the danger—if he knew what would happen to him in the event that the President should lose his precarious control over the inflationists in Congress—he would very soon make it clear to his own Senators and Representatives what would get them re-elected this autumn and what would not.

He would not only "trust" the President. He would turn to and help him. It was in order to help the average citizen understand the problem that I wrote The Money Muddle.

That Senator Pittman does not understand is obvious from this sentence:

"Any . . . citizen who borrowed money from Mr. Warburg's bank ten years ago on the basis of currency which in relation to debts and purchasing power has since shrunk to one-half its value, and finds that it now takes nearly twice as much of his products and labor to pay such loans as it did when the loan was made, is hardly disposed to agree with Mr. Warburg's monetary ideas."

The Senator has fallen prey to that moss-covered and persistent illusion of the poor worthy borrower and the rich wicked creditor.

Let us suppose that the bank with which I am associated had all or most of its funds invested in ten-year loans (for which incidentally it would at once be justly criticized as an unsound institution), and let us suppose that the purchasing power of the dollar did rise one hundred per cent. Then it would be true that most debtors would find it difficult to repay. They might—although this too is not as simple as it sounds—find it much easier to repay if the dollar were cut in half, so that its purchasing power would be restored to what it was ten years ago.

But what about the other side of the ledger?

The money a bank loans belongs to its depositors. Our bank, for instance, has over two hundred thousand of them, whose average deposit is only a little over a thousand dollars. These two hundred thousand people would have their deposit dollars cut in half—which is the same thing as having half their money confiscated—in order to make it easier for a much smaller number of borrowers to repay.

We have about fifty thousand borrowing accounts. If you have ever tried to borrow money from a bank, you know that in order to borrow money you must have money. Our fifty thousand borrowers are on the average much richer than our two hundred thousand depositors, many of whom have only a few hundred dollars to their names. Therefore, assuming that cutting the dollar in half would actually help the borrowers—which as a matter of fact is very doubtful—you can easily see what would happen.

Two hundred thousand relatively poor people would be definitely hurt so that fifty thousand more or less rich people might gain a doubtful advantage.

I disagree with Senator Pittman.

I think that any citizen who is given a fair chance to see the problem in its reality, instead of being fed on fallacies that were old when Bryan used them in 1896, can be depended upon to back the President in opposing the various alluring quack remedies that have been urged in times of distress throughout all history upon every ruler by ignorant and misguided advisers.

I have said that I trust the integrity of the President's purpose, and that if the matter rested in his hands alone, there would be no great ultimate danger. I say this in spite of "the record," rather than because I can find, as Senator Pittman finds, any great reassurance in it. The latest paragraph of the record, as written by the President's own hand, if taken literally, is to me the least reassuring of all. In his radio address of June 28, when summing up the accomplishments of the Administration since January, he said:

"Finally, and I believe most important, it [Congress] recognized, simplified, and made more fair and just our monetary system, setting up standards and policies adequate to meet the necessities of modern economic life, doing justice to both gold and silver as the metal bases behind the currency of the United States."

One may agree or disagree with the monetary policies of the Roosevelt Administration. One may or may not believe that such things as the abrogation of the gold clause in our Government's obligations were justified by the emergency. One may think that recovery has been hastened or retarded by the experimentation with the Warren-Committee-for-the-Nation gold theories. But how anyone—even the most enthusiastic supporter of the President's policies—could find that we had set up "standards and policies adequate to meet the necessities of modern economic life" passes my limited comprehension.

What standards have we set up? What policies have we? What more have we done than to abandon the gold standard, repudiate our gold obligations, pass a law authorizing the President to print three billion greenbacks and to adopt bimetallism if he wants to, and pass another law vesting in the Secretary of the Treasury all the power that is usually vested in a carefully selected and circumscribed monetary authority?

Are we going to have a dollar of variable gold content, "managed" in accordance with a price index, as our money of the future? Or are we eventually going to restore a fixed ratio to gold?

Are we going to have a non-political monetary authority, such as the Federal Reserve Board was intended to be? Or are we going to have a political one-man currency dictatorship?

Are we going to debase the currency further, as the Committee for the Nation so stridently urges? Or have we had enough of this particular medicine?

I am not saying that, with what has gone before, it would be possible to answer all these questions definitely today. I am not saying that we could instantly set up "standards and policies adequate to meet the necessities of modern economic life." But I am saying that we most emphatically have not done so as yet. I am saying that far from "recognizing" our monetary system, we have destroyed the monetary system we had without as yet setting up another; that far from "simplifying" it, we have added to its complications and uncertainties; and that, far from making it "more fair and just," we have placed ourselves on trial before history to justify by what we may eventually succeed in working out the injustices we have so far committed. (See Appendix, page 187.)

The record shows, I think, courage and open-mindedness. It shows a desire to find the right answer—if necessary, by experiment. It shows also a certain amount of caution and restraint in using the wide powers obtained from Congress. But it does not, if we are to judge by the radio address of June 28, show any realization that what has been done so far is at best emergency patchwork, and that the real job of setting up a monetary system still remains to be done.

V. CONCERNING GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURE

Finally, I have not attacked—as one might be led to suppose from Senator Pittman's "reply"—the use of Government funds to relieve suffering. Nor have I said or implied that such relief expenditure involved the abandonment of our traditional American order.

I have consistently advocated the use of Government funds to relieve distress and to start the wheels of recovery, but I have also pointed out that when a government sets out to spend more money than it can ultimately raise out of bearable taxation, it deliberately sets out to render void whatever constructive measures it may otherwise have undertaken. I have said—and say again—that Public Works, Civil Works, and similar expenditure must some day come to an end, and that if by that time private enterprise has not taken over the burden of providing employment for the majority of those still out of work, we shall be worse off than we were before the expenditure was begun.

That is why it is so important to stimulate private enterprise, particularly in the "durable goods industries," to free the capital markets, to remove uncertainty in regard to the future character and value of our money, and to find the proper balance between industry and agriculture by revising our tariff, and by helping to free the flow of goods and services between nations.

That is why it is so important that whatever our Government does, it should do with a view towards stimulating and not towards supplanting private enterprise. Because—unless private enterprise is reborn, and reborn soon, the so-called "extraordinary expenditures" will become ordinary recurring expenditures, and we shall run the twofold danger of slipping into permanent planned economy—that is, Government-controlled and directed life—and of bankrupting our national credit in the process.

That is why the danger of abandoning our traditional American order is more than a "bugaboo."

Not because anyone is plotting its overthrow—that to my mind is a bugaboo—but because, unless we guard against it, we shall drift willy-nilly into a condition of permanent enslavement to our own weakness.

That is all that an authoritarian state amounts to: a state composed of people unable to govern themselves, and therefore surrendering their liberty to a political, economic, and social tyranny of their own making.

By the awakening of individual enterprise we came out of the Dark Ages. By our failure to keep it alive we run the risk of slipping back into a form of life where man must of necessity exist for the State—instead of the State existing for man.

The battle is not lost. In fact, it has scarcely begun, for we are a people who, once we see the danger, will not readily give up the liberty that is our birthright. But it is not a battle that can be won by saying:

“And now go away and let us watch the ball-game!”

The Price of Planned Economy Abroad

In the next chapter I shall attempt to answer the question:

“Have you lost any of your rights or liberty or Constitutional freedom of action and choice?” But, before doing so, I think it may be useful to consider for a moment the contemporary experience of other nations with planned economy.

It is a truism to say that men, somehow or other, will not profit by the experience of others, but, as is the case with many truisms, that is only partially a true statement. Men, I believe, can and do profit by the experience of others when that experience is forcefully enough driven home to them—which it rarely is. In this respect it seems to me that Colonel Frank Knox, the publisher of the Chicago Daily News, has recently performed a service of real patriotism. He has done what I wish I had had the chance to do before attempting to write this book; that is, he has made a study on the ground of what has recently happened in those European countries whose people have embarked upon the course of planned economy. While he was abroad in May and

June 1934, Colonel Knox wrote a number of editorials for his newspaper in which he presented in plain language, and, to my way of thinking, with great forcefulness, what sort of buzz-saw it is with which we are monkeying.

I am quoting some of these editorials in toto, because I know of no better way to bring out the point I am trying to make in this chapter. I have not attempted to check the correctness of all the statements or figures contained in these editorials, but—if any of them should be incorrect—I know that no one would be more anxious to have them corrected than their author.

Here is the first instalment that Colonel Knox sent home from Italy, on May 12, 1934:

WHAT PRICE REGIMENTATION?

Italy, one of the first countries to resort to managed economy, and with perhaps greater experience in its practice than any other country, supplies to the rest of the world exceptional opportunities for study of the effect of such a system upon popular democratic institutions, upon individual liberty, upon economic freedom of action for both employer and employee, and finally upon the cost of government and the consequent tax burden.

What has been the cost of the managed economy imposed upon Italy under the Mussolini dictatorship?

It has destroyed every vestige of popular parliamentary government. The government is Il Duce.

Freedom of speech, freedom of the press and of assembly, right of petition—there is none.

Taxation without representation is universal, for the poor as well as for the rich.

Labor is compulsory, and capital finds its only safe employment in government bonds.

Both industry and industrial workers are subject to rule in which neither has any voice. Industry cannot expand, contract or discontinue without government approval, and labor organizations for bargaining purposes are nonexistent. Both earnings for industry and wages for labor are fixed by government edict.

That is only a partial summary of the sacrifices of rights and liberties which Italians have made in the interest of a managed economy. Such self-abnegation surely should be paid for in economic values.

What is the score of a dozen years of Fascism in Italy?

The public debt has mounted this year to the staggering total of 102,000,000,000 lire, according to government statistics. (At current exchange, the lira is worth 8.53 cents in American money, or about 11.7 to the dollar.) But to this must be added another 50,000,000,000 lire of debts not included in the government's figures. Thus, the total debt of Italy today is over 150,000,000,000 lire, or about $13,000,000,000. Five years ago it was 111,000,000,000 lire, or about $9,500,000,000.

The budget for governmental expenses in 1928 showed a surplus of income over expenses of 555,000,000 lire. The budget for 1933 showed a deficit of 3,663,000,000 lire.

Both the debt and the budget figures disclose a disquieting tendency toward ultimate national bankruptcy.

Last year taxes in Italy consumed approximately thirty-eight per cent of the total national income. This is far beyond the danger line. It spells disaster unless taxes are sharply reduced.

And what has managed economy done for employment? In January, 1930, there were approximately 500,000 unemployed. But in January, 1934, there were more than 1,150,000 out of work.

Can any one outside of the circle of the brain trust in Washington find anything in this record for America to imitate?

Here is the second one sent a few days later. See what Colonel Knox has to say about the Italian working man.

“MANAGING” CAPITAL AND LABOR

The American type of popular democracy is built upon certain inalienable rights of the individual, including the right to control one's own labor, and the similar right to control one's own property. Compulsory labor is forbidden in America, and security of personal property is guaranteed. These rights were dearly bought and have been preciousely preserved.

Italians also once enjoyed these rights. What has become of them under half a dozen years of managed economy? How has the regimentation of industry affected Italy's working classes?

The type of labor union found in America, and formerly in Italy, no longer exists here. It has been supplanted. There is only one syndicate, or union, for each trade. A worker is free to join or not, but he must pay dues to the syndicate whether he joins it or not. His work is completely regulated by it, and members of the union are always given preference in the awarding of jobs. So this alleged right to abstain from union membership is merely freedom to starve. Membership is, in effect, compulsory.

Conditions of work and wages for all Italian workers are fixed by collective contracts negotiated between the employers and government-appointed officials of the syndicate. A worker has no voice in the choice of his representatives, and no control over the decisions reached. The right to strike has been abolished. Labor controversies and disputes are handled on behalf of the workers by government-appointed officials of the syndicate. They determine whether the disputes can be referred to arbitration. The arbitrators are government officials.

If out of a job, an Italian worker cannot seek employment on his own. He must do so through the official employment bureau, which is being rapidly extended throughout the country, and which will exercise a complete monopoly of employment. An idle worker may apply for a job only in the trade or craft to which he belongs, and jobs are filled by a strict rule of seniority. The unemployed worker is prevented also from moving from one place to another in search of work; especially from the small towns and villages to the large cities. If he is found without work in some town other than his own, he may be sent back home. He is deprived of choice of movement in his search for work.

So much for the Italian workingman. What of the employers of labor? Is capital less free to create employment?

Credit, the lifeblood of industry, is now monopolized by government-controlled holding companies, or investment trusts. These trusts are supplied with capital by the government, which lends money to industry; the trusts sell their own trust certificates to the public. Their financial policies are strictly regulated by the state. No business can borrow money from these trusts without government approval.

A definite check is put upon the expansion of every plant and every industry. Government permission is required for the construction of branches of an established concern, or the construction of new factories.

An employer has no choice in the selection of his operating personnel. He must accept the people sent to him by the official employment bureau. Preference is given to members of the Fascist party. If business falls off, an employer cannot reduce the number of his employees without incurring liability for onerous liquidation payments to his employees proportional to their length of service. All conditions of employment are controlled by collective contracts in which the government always has the decisive vote. No unprofitable industry may be discontinued without the consent of the state.

Every trade and every industry has its own Chamber of Commerce, or syndicate. They are all under strict state control. A business man is free to join or not, but, whether he becomes a member or not, his business is controlled by the syndicate of his craft, and he must pay his dues. Thus, in effect, membership is compulsory. A corporative inspectorate, with quasi-police power, supervises the execution of all economic legislation.

Thus, in Italy, both labor and capital, under a managed economy, have lost their freedom. There is no longer free labor or free capital. Both have been swallowed up in the "corporative state."

From Italy Colonel Knox went to Austria, the youngest of the Fascist countries, and from there wrote the following illuminating account of what was happening there:

THE NEW ORDER IN AUSTRIA

Born of the February riots which marked the overthrow, as a legal political organization, of the Socialist party, the present Austrian government consumed but a few weeks in drafting and adopting a new constitution, which has created Europe's newest "corporative state." By government fiat, the terms of the constitution were made effective. Sufficient time has not yet elapsed to give effect to decrees which are now in the making and which will provide for an Austrian "managed economy," but, immature as these plans now are, the present posture of Austrian affairs is highly useful to American students of the corporative-state principle. For here one finds unconcealed and undenied the inspiration for this corporative phase of experimentation with an economic "new deal."

Austria in medieval times provided Europe with the most highly developed form of the guild—or trade organization, comprising both employers and workers in each industry—which served as a model and an inspiration for "new dealers" in both Europe and America in their efforts to set up a "new" economic order. Both Mussolini in Italy and the Brain Trust in the United States deny that their formula for a new order was borrowed from the guild principle of the Middle Ages, but here in Austria Chancellor Dollfuss and his collaborators boast that economic workers returning to Austria developed the guild idea, which is now to be reasserted in the land of its highest earlier development.

Under the new constitution all Austrians will be divided into seven guilds. The farmers and all others employed in agriculture and forestry comprise the first of these guilds; the second is made up of all those engaged in industry and mining; the third includes all storekeepers and others engaged in trade; the fourth all those engaged in commerce, transportation and communication; the fifth bankers and all those employed in banking and insurance; the sixth members of the free professions, such as teachers, priests, scientists, artists, doctors and lawyers; the seventh civil servants and state officials.

The appointment of leaders for all of these seven guilds will be dictated by the government, which will also exercise the right of final decision in price-fixing, wages, working hours, the scale of production and the limits of competition. Both the strike and the lockout will be forbidden. The regimentation of both industry and agriculture will be complete. Thus, as in Italy, the loss of individual freedom will be complete.

Likewise there will be as complete a loss of political freedom. For the scheme of political government which is to be imposed under this restoration of the guild system has even less of human liberty in it than the political system of the Middle Ages under which it first flourished. Under this "new economic order" Austria will be governed by a more absolute dictatorship than postwar Europe has yet produced.

First, there is to be a State Council made up of from forty to fifty "elder statesmen" appointed by the president for ten years. To this is to be added a Cultural Council whose membership, numbering from thirty to forty, will include appointed teachers, priests and representatives of science and art. The third of these councils, the Economic Council, will include seventy to eighty members to be elected by the guilds. The fourth, or Provincial, council will be made up of eighteen delegates, two from each of the nine provinces. These four councils will have only advisory duties. They will meet in secret and may only suggest changes in the laws. They will not originate legislation.

Above these councils will be a Federal Diet of fifty-nine members appointed from the four advisory councils. Twenty of the fifty-nine will come from the guilds. The Diet may only say "yes" or "no" to proposals, and there will be no debate. These bodies, under a dictator provided with ample power to maintain himself in office, constitute the "corporate state" of Austria.

Under the banner of "managed economy" democracy has been throttled. Parliamentary government has been destroyed. Political parties are forbidden.

Free speech and a free press, the right of assembly and the right of petition are all abolished.

Thus the New Order in Austria.

Having seen what Fascism looked like, Colonel Knox next went to Russia in order to observe at first hand the effects of the other variation of planned economy—namely, Communism. His first observations, sent home the first week in June, are the following:

RUSSIA'S PLANS NOT FOR US

Russia, from which country I have just come, is undoubtedly engaged in a monumental experiment in the field of managed economy and planned society. The experiment may, or may not, be suited to the Russian temperament and to Russian conditions. Time alone will determine that.

Certainly my visit was too short to warrant my expressing any dogmatic views on Russia's destiny. I did stay long enough, however, to learn that the Russian experiment offers nothing whatever for America to imitate. Only an utterly distorted conception of the American spirit and of the peculiar American genius for self-help and self-government could find in Moscow any inspiration or suggestion that would be helpful in the United States.

Of the ideals of a free, democratic state which may be found in theory in the Marx-Lenin school of political philosophy, it can be said with truth that our forebears sought a new world in which to give them expression long before Marx or Lenin was born, when Russia was still wallowing in a state of barbaric feudalism, shot through with the Tartar genius for exploitation of the weak by the strong. Of the remainder of the social and economic tenets of Russian Sovietism, it may be said that they are unsuited to our use because:

1. They must operate within the frame of a political organization repugnant to every principle underlying a free democracy.

2. They must have for their theatre of activity a country suffering from a shortage of almost every commodity essential to a bare living, totally lacking not only in the luxuries of life but even in those things which contribute to moderate comfort.

3. They must have as their adherents and beneficiaries people whose history has known no freedom, whose training and experience in local and national self-government have been nil, people who are accustomed to a standard of living only a step above that of the beasts that frequently are housed with them under the same roof-tree.

4. Their practice must be accompanied by a military discipline which, without resort to trial or court, will enforce laws forbidding freedom of speech, freedom of the press, the right of assembly and petition and mandatory trial by jury.

Their successful maintenance demands compulsory military service, denial of the right of participation in government by any but members of the one political party that is allowed to exist, supervision of all social and, particularly, all political activity by a secret police which strikes in the dark, and from whose arbitrary action there is no appeal.

How can you fit such a system into the pattern of a free democracy?

The next instalment concerning Russia is to my mind as significant a document as any I have read for some time. Most of us think that Communism at least has the virtue that all share alike. That beautiful dream is completely dispelled by the following:

DEMOCRACY OR TERRORISM?

At a luncheon given by the foreign office of the Russian government in Moscow, I was told by a high official that Russia was conducting a great experiment in democracy. I have no right to challenge the sincerity of that observation. I replied by asking what was the total membership of the Communist party in Russia, and was told that it numbered about 3,000,000. The total population of soviet Russia is 165,000,000. Only Communists are permitted active participation in the government.

My reference to the discrepancy between the total number of the ruling class and the number ruled made little or no impression upon my Russian host. He vigorously challenged my definition of their form of government as an autocracy dominated by a dictatorship which, however well intentioned and benevolent, was absolute in its summary denial of the democratic principle of self-government. Judged by American democratic standards, there is no question as to the correctness of my definition.

The actual government in Russia is vested in the Communist party, which includes only 1.2 per cent of the entire population. The Communist party in turn is controlled by a small group of high officials who maintain themselves in office by a combination of shameless propaganda, political intrigue and a police-enforced terror, backed by the standing army of 600,000 soldiers.

The basic unit of the Communist government is the yachieka, composed of all the Communist party members in every factory, office, village or military unit. Of these there are about 50,000. These units act under the orders and instructions of the next higher unit, which, theoretically, the members of the yachieka help to choose. Thus the village committee takes its orders from the county committee and the county committee receives its instructions from the provincial committee.

Theoretically, the government is vested in the all-union soviet congress, the basis of representation in which is one delegate for each 125,000 rural voters, and one representative for each 25,000 city voters. All slates of candidates are chosen by party committees and, there being no opposition party, the elections are by acclamation.

However, even this gesture in the direction of democracy is empty. The congress meets but once in two years, and has no real legislative functions. Legislative authority is vested in the all-union central soviet executive committee, known in Russia as the Tsik. It is made up of about one-fourth of the members of the congress, and all are hand-picked by the cabinet, or, as it is known in Russia, the council of people's commissars.

Paralleling this formal pattern of government, and always superior to it, is the Communist party organization, which heads up in the party central committee of about 150 members, from which is selected the all-powerful political bureau of only ten men. These men are the autocrats of all Russia. The political bureau is headed and dictated to by Stalin, whose only office is that of secretary of the party central committee.

The real underlying truth of the Russian situation is that this vast country, which includes between one-sixth and one-seventh of the earth's surface, which is probably the greatest storehouse of undeveloped natural resources in the world, and has a population of 165,000,000, has merely changed its exploiters. Formerly its people were exploited mercilessly by czars and the Russian nobility for their selfish benefit. Today they are being exploited by self-selected representatives of a party which numbers barely more than one per cent of the total population, for the selfish benefit of the members of that party.

In this new form of exploitation there is as little for emulation in a true democracy such as ours as there was in the older Russian form which expired in the fires of bloody revolution in 1917.

And now see what is happening to the Russian farmer under planned economy:

REGIMENTATION AND STARVATION

Curiously enough it has been from Secretary Wallace of the Department of Agriculture and his assistant, Rexford Tugwell, that Americans have heard the most respectful and complimentary references to the Russian experiment in planned economy. This is noteworthy. While something of a case might be made out for the factory worker under the Communist system as practiced in Russia, farm conditions are intolerable, and the state of the Russian peasant is wretched beyond description. Any attempt to impose upon American farmers anything remotely approaching conditions on the best conducted Russian collective farms would provoke armed resistance at once.

Sixty-five per cent of the Russian peasants, I learned in Moscow, are now established on collective farms. The remaining 35 per cent are individual farmers, nominally owning their farms and selling for their own benefit such of their products as are left after the tax collector has taken over the larger part for the state.

The collective farms are of two types. The first is known as the "artel," in which only the land and the horses are pooled, and the individual is permitted to retain his house, garden, chickens, pigs and so on. The second is the "commune" type, in which everything is pooled and life is wholly communistic, with common living quarters, common dining room and common arrangements for the care of children. The latter form has proved unsatisfactory and ultimately all farms are to be of the "artel" model.

The foreman of each collective farm is appointed by the political leader of the region. He lays out all of the work of the farm, assisted by a so-called expert from the nearest tractor station. At every tractor station there is a "political section" of six or seven men, appointed by the party leaders. They determine the disposal of the land and how the work shall be carried on. They supervise the harvesting and enforce the collection of the state's share of the crops. Every farmer has his work assigned to him and at the end of the year is credited with the number of days of work he has done. Upon that basis the peasant shares in the fruits of his year of toil. After the government has taken its share, the remainder of the crop is sold, either to the city co-operatives or on the open market, and the proceeds are divided, each peasant receiving a share proportionate to the amount of work he has contributed. If, in addition to his work on the collective farm, a farmer has some garden produce, chickens or pigs to sell, he must pay an additional heavy tax on those sales.

In the sustained effort to put all farming upon a collective basis, the lot of the individual farmer is made extremely hard. He is forced to pay taxes in kind, and if he sells for cash he must pay part of the proceeds to the state. The average individual farm does not exceed two to four acres, and life is reduced to the penury and squalor of peasant life in medieval times. But such is the tenacity with which a Russian clings to his own little farm that, even under such incredibly harsh conditions, the extension of the collective principle has been slow and difficult.

Many of the more active peasant opponents of the collective-farm idea have been sent to the mines or the forests for long terms at forced labor in order to break down the home-loving instinct.

If short crops are harvested, the government, in order to feed the industrial workers in the cities, takes virtually all, sometimes leaving not enough food for the farmer to feed his family. Only last year, because of widespread crop failure, from four to seven million peasants died of starvation. This year another short crop impends. The price of bread in Moscow has been doubled and fresh hardships await the peasant who must keep his family through the winter on what the tax collector leaves.

This is the story of Russian regimentation of agriculture, applied to one of the richest agricultural regions of the world. At best it provides the farmer a bare subsistence; at worst it is slow death through forcible deprivation of those very means of sustaining life which the farmer provides.

Perhaps in a way the plight of the Russian peasant is not as surprising as it might be. I know it was not completely surprising to me, but what was surprising to me is the condition of the Russian laborer as it is portrayed in Colonel Knox's final editorial, which follows:

RUSSIA'S VIRTUAL LABOR SLAVERY

The Russian revolution of 1917 was the work of a small group of intellectuals, co-operating with the mass of industrial workers of Leningrad and Moscow. The government those revolutionaries set up was frankly and avowedly government by and for the industrial workers of Russia. Consequently, if there is any class in Russia which is a beneficiary of the Communist type of managed economy, it is the working class—a comparatively small percentage of Russia's whole population.

There has been some improvement in their standard of living, but even that statement is possible only because of the incredibly low standard which obtained before the revolution. If the Russian workers' present conditions of life were imposed on American workers, even in the depths of depression, they would resist by armed revolt.

But, laying aside the question of living standards, how has an ordered economy affected the freedom and liberties of the workers of Russia?

It should always be remembered that Russia is ruled with an iron hand by the Communist party, made up of fewer than 3,000,000 of the entire population of 165,000,000. Not all the workers in factories, by any means, are admitted to the party. Consequently, most of the workers, as well as most of the farmers, have no voice whatever in their own government. Government is imposed from above. Each factory has its own trade union, but in each plant the labor organization is paralleled by a Communist party organization to which only party members can belong. Both are elected by the workers.

Each factory has a director and several assistants appointed by the higher political authority, but the actual operations within the plant are under the direction of a committee of three—the factory director (politically selected by higher authority), an elected representative of the labor union and an elected representative of the Communist party organization in the plant. Theoretically, these three have equal powers—but only in theory. The director's authority is final and supreme; the powers of the other two are only advisory. One-man rule was found imperative in order to get production. The director can hire and fire as he pleases, so long as he does not offend the higher political authority which gave him his job. Work is paid for almost wholly on the piece scale. The minimum wage is very low, and there is a sharp differential in the wages paid to skilled and to unskilled labor. This is producing class distinction. The workers have no voice in questions of wages and hours, and membership in a labor union is compulsory. On the other hand, a worker can become a member of the Communist party organization in his factory only by election.

The seven-hour day and the five-day work week are decreed by law, but most plants are working much longer hours, with overtime paid. The average earnings of industrial workers are between 200 and 250 roubles a month. Employment in a factory provides a worker with a card, which guarantees him full value of the rouble (about 70 cents) in payments for rent, heat, light and water and for food at the co-operative stores. For all other purchases the worker must pay at the depreciated value of the rouble (about 5 cents). This means substantial deprivation of everything but the bare necessities.

In both Moscow and Leningrad there is a frightful congestion of living quarters. Whole families of workers live in a single room, under utterly intolerable conditions.

It is estimated that the workers of Russia number from 25,000,000 to 33,000,000, or from 15 to 20 per cent of the total population. Of these not more than 2,000,000 are members of the Communist party. For the rest of this industrial class, in whose behalf the government is alleged to be operated, there is no voice in the choice of their rulers, no control over their own labor, no power to control working conditions, no say as to what they shall be paid. But they themselves must pay the prices fixed for necessities, and they are substantially denied any luxuries or even comforts. If they quit their jobs without permission they and their families are left to starve.

They may not go elsewhere to find other jobs without a permit, and they cannot leave Russia under any circumstances.

Such are life and the conditions of living which an ordered economy imposes upon Russian workers. It is easy to understand why the most determined foes of Communism in America have been the American labor unions.

And now I shall quote an editorial sent from Berlin on June 9, which, taken in the light of subsequent developments, shows how shrewd an observer is our authority for this kaleidoscopic sketch of what is going on abroad:

GERMAN PORTENTS

Despite Hitler's imitation of Mussolini's managed economy, conditions in Germany are steadily going from bad to worse. Affairs have now reached so critical a point—the lavish Nazi promises of improved conditions are so obviously failing of fulfillment—that sentiment against the Hitler regime is actually becoming vocal, despite the extremities of terrorism to which the Nazis resort.

Just a few days before my arrival in Berlin an anti-Nazi demonstration in Dresden included a denunciation of Hitler by a group of Brownshirts! The anxiety which such developments have produced in the Hitler cabinet is reflected by fresh intemperance in the form of attacks by Goebbels and others upon the Jews. The quarrel of the Hitlerites with the Catholics over Nazi attempts to control religion is an increasingly important factor in the situation. On Corpus Christi day the unusually large and well-organized demonstration and parade of Catholics in Berlin was eloquent of the growing resentment in anti-Nazi quarters.

Because of the economic slump, including the rapid approach of a financial crisis, and the accumulated effects of the fanaticism prompted and fostered by the Nazis against Jews, Catholics, Free Masons and Protestants, among the members of these various groups outside the borders of Germany there is a widespread expectation that a new crisis in German affairs impends. If a change of rulers results, it is expected that the new regime will be a military dictatorship.

Economic facts which lend color to these views on the immediate future of Germany include the falling off of income of the ordinary workers from an average of 170 marks per month a year ago to 147 marks now. (At current exchange rates the mark is worth about 38 1-2 cents.) This decline in income has been accompanied by a slow but steady increase in living costs. The quality of goods offered for sale is being steadily lowered, and resort is being made to many of the substitutes used in the war days. The gold reserve, used as a cover for the paper note issues, is decreasing rapidly. It dropped 32,000,000 marks in April and recently reached a new all-time low, with a gold coverage of only 3.7 per cent.

In the security market sagging prices for both bonds and stocks reflect the growing sense of insecurity. While no war blockade exists to interfere with international trade, a peace-time blockade, the direct result of Nazi treatment of the Jews, Catholics and Protestants within Germany, is making itself felt in no uncertain manner. German export figures are eloquent of the success of the anti-Nazi campaign in foreign countries.

The wave of antagonism to democracy and democratic principles, and the substitution of the authoritative state, accompanied by the resort to planned and managed economies, which swept the depression-racked peoples of Europe off their political and economic balance, found its wildest and most extreme climax in Germany. It is to Germany, therefore, that we may look for the first collapse, and the beginnings of a return to sanity in both government and economics.

Unless all present portents are misread, the hour of repentance is not far off.

“What Liberties Have You Lost?”

Whether or not the reader agrees with all of the observations and conclusions reached by Colonel Knox, I am sure that no one could fail to be impressed with the cogency of his general conclusion: namely, that whatever the benefits of a planned economy, the price of these benefits is the loss of freedom. Having reached that point, it would be only natural for the reader to want to hear the other side of the argument. I shall not attempt to present it, because I am not impartial enough to be even reasonably effective as a “devil’s advocate,” but I refer the reader to a book recently published by Mr. Walter Lippmann. This book, The Method of Freedom, is the most ingenious defense of planned economy that I have seen.

I say “ingenious” because it seems to me that what Mr. Lippmann does is first to set forth and admit the entire case against “planned economy.” Then he invents something which he calls “compensated economy,” for which he claims that it will give us, without essential sacrifice of freedom, the element of security for which the planners are striving.

If I understand it correctly, Mr. Lippmann's "compensated economy" is really nothing more than a defensive rather than an offensive "planned economy"; that is, it is a scheme of things in which the government seeks to offset by action of its own any exaggerated economic trends that may arise in a free economy. This involves: first, that the government must be able to recognize such trends; and, second, that it must find the proper means to counteract them.

One hesitates to take issue with so careful a student of these matters as Mr. Lippmann, but it seems to me that while the theory of his "compensated economy" may be perfectly sound, the suggestion, as applied to a democratic country and a government dependent upon popular election, will not work as a practical matter. I say this because I do not believe that a government elected on the basis of a political system such as ours will ever be able to recognize economic trends with sufficient accuracy; and because I am even more convinced that if it does recognize the trends, it will only act to offset periods of contraction—that is, depression—but will never act to put on the brakes in periods of prosperity.

Moreover, I fear it is inevitable that any government agency set up to run a "compensated economy" would soon gather unto itself all the power necessary to run a "planned economy." This is the historical evolution of all government bureaus. The time to stop is before you start.

It is quite possible that I have missed the point of Mr. Lippmann's book. It is therefore no more than fair to urge the reader who wishes to form an independent judgment to study The Method of Freedom, if only because of the excellent analysis of what a "planned economy" is.

And now let us seek to apply the microscope to our own case and see how we should answer Mr. Roosevelt's question.

I think we should begin by saying that we know that in war it is necessary and right—in so far as anything connected with war can be called right—that the rights and liberties of the individual be submerged in the greater interest of national safety. I think we should go on to say that the emergency which existed in March 1933 was in many respects similar to a war and that it therefore justified a similar attitude on the part of the Government, and that we did not mind being good soldiers until the enemy was repelled from our homes.

But I think we should say that America has never believed and does not now believe in compulsory military training nor a large standing army, and that we think it is dangerous to keep too many of us parading around in uniforms too long after the emergency is over. I think we should say that we think the acute emergency which paralyzed our economic life is over, and that, while there is still much suffering and hardship, we have to deal from here on, not with a crisis, but with a recuperative process, and with the problems of reconstruction. For this we do not think we need any war-time psychology.

In fact we think that the war-time psychology of blindly taking orders and executing them will, if continued, stand in the way of recovery, because it will get us out of the habit of taking our own responsibilities and into the habit of expecting someone else to take them for us. We have seen what that leads to in Italy, Austria, Germany, and Russia. We know that no one seriously wants to emulate those countries, but we feel worried because we fear the habit may grow on us and leave us eventually unable to stand on our own feet as Americans should.

It is difficult for the average citizen to give an accurate answer to the question: "What liberties have you lost?" because it is almost impossible for him to analyze and evaluate the New Deal legislation and administrative regulations. These constitute a body of laws—according to a recent report of a special committee of the American Bar Association—several times greater in length than all the previous Federal legislation passed since the adoption of the Constitution in 1789.

The N.R.A. alone is stated to have issued over ten thousand pages of regulations.

Nevertheless it is possible to name some of the things that trouble us because we see in them—or think we see in them—a departure from our traditional principles of freedom.

Abraham Lincoln, in his Cooper Union speech of 1860, said:

"Now and here let me guard a little against being misunderstood. I do not mean to say that we are bound to follow implicitly in whatever our fathers did. To do so would be to discard all the lights of current experience—to reject all progress, all improvement. What I do say is, that if we would supplant the opinions and policy of our fathers in any case, we should do so on evidence so conclusive, and argument so clear, that even their great authority, fairly considered and weighed, cannot stand."

And again, in a message to Congress, on December 3, 1861, Lincoln said:

"Many independent men, everywhere in these states, a few years back in their lives were hired laborers. The prudent, penniless beginner in the world labors for wages a while, saves a surplus with which to buy tools or land for himself, then labors on his own account for another while, and at length hires another new beginner to help him. That is the just and generous and prosperous system which opens the way to all, gives hope to all, and consequent energy and progress and improvement of condition to all. No men living are more worthy to be trusted than those who toil up from poverty, none less inclined to take or touch aught which they have not honestly earned. Let them beware of surrendering a political power which they already possess, and which, if surrendered, will surely be used to close the door of advancement against such as they, and to fix new disabilities and burdens upon them, till all of liberty shall be lost."

Few of us could state half so clearly what we think and feel today as Abraham Lincoln stated it for us at the time of another great national emergency. And during that emergency of the Civil War, when much the same questions were at stake, the United States Supreme Court rendered the following decision:

"The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and for the people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by wit of man than that any of the provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of Government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism."

And so I think we might say that those of us who are farmers are troubled at the thought that in future we must be told what to grow, how much to grow, and where to grow it. We dislike the idea that we shall have to pay taxes in order to support a vast army of Government officials, who will make our decisions for us and then see that these decisions are carried out. We are grateful for advice, but we pride ourselves on being free men who must be allowed, if necessary, to make our own mistakes from time to time and suffer the consequences.

Similarly, those of us who are industrial workers are grateful for being protected against unfair exploitation, but we do not like being told that we may only work a given number of hours and under such and such conditions, and that, irrespective of individual circumstances, we must all conform to a general pattern. We want the right to bargain collectively with our employers, but we do not want to be compelled to do so; nor do we want to be compelled to belong to any organizations, unless we are convinced that it is in our own interest to do so.

Those of us who are industrial employers and manufacturers are perfectly willing to co-operate with each other, with our employees, and with the consumer to eliminate unfair practice wherever it may exist. We are willing to abide by such laws as may be enacted in order to further this aim, provided that we have due recourse to the courts to protect our rights within these laws. But we do not want a Government bureaucracy to tell us what to pay our employees, what to charge the consumer for our products, and whether or not we may modernize our plants.

Those of us who are shareholders, directors, or executives of railroads, public utilities, and banks want to know whether we are going to be expected to continue the operation of our respective enterprises under a better system of protecting the public interest than we have had in the past, or whether it is the intention of the Government to take over the operation and control of our companies.

And, finally, all of us who are citizens, no matter what our individual position may be, are vitally interested in the following questions, the answers to which are very far from clear to us today:

1. How far is the Government expenditure program going to be continued on borrowed money? When is the Government going to attempt to balance its revenues and expenditures by increasing taxation? How heavy is that taxation going to be, and on whom will it fall? We know that we are running behind now at the rate of four billion dollars a year. We know that somewhere there must be a limit. We know that eventually we shall have to pay for every dollar that is being spent so lavishly today. We feel uneasy, because we know that we are doing something as a nation that we should be afraid to do as individuals—that is, run up a lot of charge accounts without finding out how much our purchases amount to. We don't want the burden of our carelessness to fall upon our children.

2. How far does the Government intend to go in debasing the dollar? If the purpose of reducing its gold content to forty per cent is ultimately to reduce its purchasing power by forty per cent, then all of us who have any dollars saved or invested in life-insurance policies will have forty per cent of what we have saved taken away. If that is really wise and necessary we can stand it, but we should like to know whether that is all, or whether there is worse to come. And we should like to know what is going to raise our wages and incomes by forty per cent so that they will continue to buy our necessities. If the purchasing power of the dollars we receive is to be reduced by forty per cent—which is the announced intention of the devaluation program—then we shall need more of the cheaper dollars in order that we may buy what we can buy today. Otherwise we shall have suffered a very distinct invasion of our rights. What is going to give us more dollars?

3. Thomas Jefferson, a great Democrat, said that the best government was the government which governed least. Abraham Lincoln, a great Republican, said: "In great emergency moderation is generally safer than radicalism."

Granted that it may be wise and necessary in an emergency to concentrate great power in the hands of the executive, when will these powers be returned to Congress? How long will it be before we can again look to our Senators and Representatives to exercise the functions we have delegated to them?

4. It is a precious possession of a free people to have their rights and liberties protected by a trained professional judiciary, which decides upon the rights of individuals in specific circumstances within the framework of the general principles laid down by the law.

Have we not lost a fundamental bulwark of our liberty when many of these judicial functions are delegated to administrative officials, untrained as judges, bound by partisanship, and committed in advance to the philosophy of their political superiors? Is it not contrary to our rights under the Constitution that a single Government bureau—such as an N.R.A. code authority—should issue regulations which have all the binding quality of law and can be enforced by penalties, while at the same time it should act as the sole judicial tribunal to interpret the rights of individuals under its own regulations?

In conclusion, I think we should say that we have lost quite a little of our liberty, quite a few of our Constitutional rights and privileges, for the time being. We should say that this would not particularly worry us—although perhaps it ought to—if we felt certain that we should get them back, once the emergency is declared over; but that we are worried because we see no sign of a diminishing encroachment by the Federal Government upon the rights of states and individuals, now that the emergency is beginning to subside. On the contrary, we see indications that many of the powers conferred upon the central Government as emergency powers are being regarded more and more as permanent powers, and that a great central bureaucracy has come into being with all the ear-marks of intending to stay.

We should say that we are worried, not so much by what has happened, as by what may be in store for us in the future.

What, Then, Should We Conclude?

It will, I think, be evident to the reader from the preceding chapters that, whether we like it or not, we have drifted quite far in the direction of attempting to plan and regulate our economic life by vesting vast discretionary power in a central Government. It will be equally clear that we have not gone so far in that direction as Italy, Austria, Germany, or Russia. The question that we must decide is:

Are we going to pursue further the course upon which we have started—that is, the course which seeks to provide security at the expense of freedom—or do we hold freedom so dear that we do not wish to proceed further along the lines of the various European experiments?

Before proceeding to attempt to answer this question it would perhaps be well to define clearly what we mean by freedom and what we mean by security.

Freedom, in the sense in which I have used and shall use it here, does not mean unrestrained and unregulated liberty of action on the part of the individual. It means the right of individuals to think, to work, and to express themselves as they desire. It means the right of each individual to improve his own circumstances through his own efforts so long as he does not in so doing encroach upon the similar rights of others. Such freedom is based upon the recognition that all men are not created equal, and upon the recognition that to be born with superior strength or intellect or material advantage carries with it an obligation to use such strength for the general welfare and not solely for selfish gain.

It means that people voluntarily agree with each other to abide by certain rules of the game designed to prevent one individual from taking unfair advantage of another.

It means the sanctity of property rights and the sanctity of contracts.

It means a government of laws as opposed to a government of discretionary power vested in men.

Security, in the sense in which I use it here, means a guarantee that we shall have tomorrow what we have today. It does not mean freezing in perpetuity the present condition in which we have millions of unemployed and a maladjusted economy, but it means that first our present ills are to be remedied by government planning, so that everyone will be reasonably secure, and that then this condition of universal security is to be more or less frozen in perpetuity.

The "security" aimed at is not so much a security for savings out of past work as it is a guarantee of employment for reasonable compensation. Wealth—which is savings—is to become less securely intrenched. The propertyless man is to be sure of a job that pays him a decent wage.

Recognizing that the accumulation of capital is essential to any economic structure, if only to replace the outworn tools and machinery of production, those who would seek "security" by government planning would let the Government be the one to accumulate the capital of the community, and likewise the one to spend it.

I for one do not believe we should attempt to acquire this hypothetical "security" by government capitalism for three very simple reasons:

1. I do not believe that it is possible to create a state of being—that is, a condition of life—which human beings would be satisfied to accept in perpetuity. I believe that a static condition—no matter what condition—is the very thing that most quickly destroys what, for want of a better name, we call happiness.

2. I do not believe that it is possible by any human agency to guarantee that any state of happiness or unhappiness shall remain static. And

3. Even if it were possible to make us all reasonably "happy" and to guarantee that we should remain so, I do not believe that the American people would or should be willing to pay the price, because that price is not only the sacrifice of freedom, but the sacrifice of progress.

I shall take up each of these three points in order, but first, so that we may realize that the alternative to government-planned "security" does not involve going back to the evils that we have suffered in the past, and to show that under a system of free economy we have moved far and rapidly towards the protection of the weak against the strong, let us glance for a moment at a document which shows clearly, I think, the wake of the vessel in which we have been sailing.

This document is the platform of the Socialist party, on which Eugene V. Debs ran for President in 1912. It contained the following planks:

1. A separate Department of Labor.

This was set up in 1913.

2. Old-age pensions.

These are established in many states of the Union and are now being considered by the Federal Government.

3. Higher income and inheritance taxes.

These are in effect.

4. Woman suffrage.

This was granted in 1920.

5. Reforestation and reclamation of waste land.

Both have been undertaken by the Federal Government on a large scale.

6. A public works program.

(See P.W.A.)

7. Government employment bureaus.

These have been established for some time.

8. Shorter hours and minimum wage scales.

(See N.R.A.)

9. No child labor under sixteen.

Twenty states have ratified a Constitutional amendment to prohibit labor of persons under eighteen.

10. Initiative, referendum, and recall.

One or another in practice in many states.

11. Curbing of the power of courts to issue injunctions in labor disputes.

This is now part of our law.

From these Socialist planks of 1912 it is evident that what was considered Socialism twenty-two years ago has in large measure now become accepted orthodox doctrine. No Socialist of today would deny that our present system is a capitalistic system, and yet obviously that capitalistic system has progressed in twenty-two years far enough to have satisfied these Socialist demands on which Mr. Debs polled some 850,000 votes in 1912.

I mention this merely because we are all of us too prone to think that just because labels do not change, the substances which bear the labels likewise remain unaltered.

If we are to understand our present-day problem, it seems to me essential that we should realize how far we have already gone towards Socialism, and that we cannot go very much further without destroying individual enterprise, which is the motive power by which our economic order is propelled.

That does not mean that there is not ample room for reform and improvement within the framework of a capitalistic order. We shall come to that in a subsequent chapter.

Now to return to my theme:

1. I do not believe that it is possible to create a condition of life which human beings would be satisfied to accept in perpetuity, because I do not believe that it is possible to remove from human nature the desire to improve itself. Assuming for the moment that an all-wise and all-powerful government could redistribute what "happiness" there is in the world in such a way that everyone would have an equal share of it, I do not think for a minute that we should be satisfied with the result. I know only too well that whatever it was that would have made me "happy" a year ago would certainly not make me "happy" today. And I feel reasonably sure that all of us would rather be a little "unhappy" today with the hope of something better tomorrow, than "reasonably happy" today with the certainty that we should never be any happier."

2. I do not believe that it is possible by any human agency to guarantee that any distribution of the desirable things of life shall be permanent.

Assuming again that there could be such a thing as an all-wise and all-powerful government, it would be necessary to assume that its power and wisdom would extend, not only over the field of human activities, but over natural forces as well. It would be necessary to assume that such a government could prevent floods, droughts, and earthquakes. We have learned to build dikes so as to prevent some of the worst ravages of floods. We have learned to irrigate arid lands. We have learned to make fire-extinguishers. Undoubtedly we can learn more along the lines of protecting ourselves against the violence of nature. But I for one cannot assume that any group of human beings can so control human activity and natural activity as to offer any reasonable guarantee of perpetuating any given distribution of wealth or "happiness."

More specifically, we have seen the efforts that our Government has made to control both the production of things and the prices at which the things produced are to be sold. If such a plan is to be successful, it seems to me that it must necessarily involve not only the control of supply, but also the control of demand.

A government which sets out to control demand sets out to control human desires, and that again I cannot consider as a practical possibility.

3. Finally, assuming that I am wrong about both the two preceding reasons for not believing in a planned economy—that is, assuming that an all-wise and all-powerful government could, first, redistribute "happiness" in such a way as to make us all satisfied to perpetuate the condition achieved, and, second, that it could as a practical matter accomplish the perpetuation—then I should still reject a government-planned economy on the ground that the price we should have to pay for it is the sacrifice of freedom and the sacrifice of progress.

We have seen in a preceding chapter how freedom and the democratic principle have gone by the board in Italy, Germany, Austria, and Russia. It seems to me inevitable that if complete power over the regulation of demand and supply—that is, complete power to control the desire to have and the desire to create—is to be vested in a central governmental authority, then that central governmental authority must of necessity rule with an iron hand. Such a government can brook no criticism, can tolerate no free press, and must act in all respects as a general commanding an army in the field. It follows that the citizens in a country so governed must inevitably become an army of pawns moved backwards and forwards according to the dictates of the supreme command. They must be fed their rations wherever and whenever they are given time to eat. They must dig where they are told to dig, stand where they are told to stand, and fight when and whom they are told to fight in blind obedience to the orders they receive.

Just as it seems inevitable that the price to be paid is the loss of freedom, so it seems even more inescapable that progress, too, must be sacrificed. If we are to be guaranteed that we shall have tomorrow what we have today, it follows that we must accept the other side of the coin, which is that we shall have no more tomorrow than we have today.

It may be claimed that this is not true because it would still be possible under such a system to increase the aggregate wealth or happiness, as you may choose to call it, and thereby increase pro rata the wealth or happiness of all of us. In theory this may be true. In practice I do not believe it is true, because such progress as the human race has achieved has been made through the exercise of that very mechanism of the human desire to have, and the human will to create, which is to be superseded under planned economy by the mathematical calculations and plotted curves of a dictatorial management.

It is a mistake to assume that the idea of planned economy originated with the New Deal or even with the various European nations which have embarked upon similar experiments. Planned economy is a reversion to the old feudal system, under which we had centuries so devoid of human progress, so stagnant, and so, if you like, "secure" in the sense that there was no change, that this period is still referred to as the period of the Dark Ages.

In saying what I have said, I am not attacking the present Administration for starting a trend towards planned economy. That trend was started when planned economy was forced upon all nations which participated in the War. For a time after the War it looked as if we at least had shaken off the tendency in this direction, but when the depression set in, planning certainly became just as much a part of the Republican philosophy under Hoover as it is now part of the Democratic philosophy under Roosevelt. The Hoover Administration thought it could maintain high wages and high prices by Government intervention contrary to natural economic laws. It failed, because it was attempting the impossible. It would have failed in any case because its efforts were too timid and too inconsistent. The Roosevelt Administration has tried to do the same thing more courageously, though scarcely more consistently. Probably any government that would have found itself in power from 1929 on would have attempted to do much the same thing.

It all goes back to what I said in the first chapter of this book: namely, that we, the American people, have demanded of our Government, ever since the depression began, that it should perform miracles.

If we demand miracles, we must be prepared for quack remedies.

If we confess our inability to govern ourselves, we must not be surprised if a Government that depends for its life upon being popular with us tries to exercise the authority that we ourselves have abdicated.

With the state of mind of the American people as it was in March 1933 and as it still is very largely today, a government in Washington would have to be something more than human if it did not come to the conclusion that recovery could only be brought about by its own actions.

That is why it is so important that we, the people, should face the fundamental issue that confronts us and, having faced the issue and made our choice, that we should then realize that if we want security we must not shed tears about our lost freedom or rail at a government which is encroaching upon our liberties.

I am convinced that if the issue can be presented to the American people with sufficient clarity and simplicity, there is no question that they will choose "freedom" rather than "security"; that they will choose democracy rather than dictatorship; that they will choose the opportunity for progress rather than an insurance policy of doubtful value against retrogression.

If Not Inflation or Planned Economy—Then What?

Those who ardently support the New Deal are impatient of all criticism unless it offers an alternative. John W. Davis, speaking of this habit of mind, recently remarked with great aptitude: "It is not quite clear why one who sees his friend driving towards a precipice must wait to warn him until he can produce a road map of the district."

That seems to me an extraordinarily sound common-sense observation. In the summer of 1933, when a few of us were vainly opposing the adoption of the Warren gold theory and the whole inflationary trend which it served to cloak, we were constantly confronted with the statement: "Well, then, what have you got to suggest that will raise farm prices and lighten the burden of debt?"

If one answered quite honestly that one had no alternative rabbit to pull out of the hat, and did not believe that there was any such animal, the effect was that one's criticism of the Warren plan was more or less brushed aside. In other words, the New Deal is so wedded to the idea that there is always a way to short-circuit the natural forces, always a way to avoid natural consequences, that one cannot successfully expose a "miracle" unless one is willing to peddle a "counter-miracle."

It is not because I disagree with Mr. Davis that I am going to attempt to develop what seem to me the basic outlines of a course that we might pursue, if we decided to abandon both the idea of seeking a monetary cure through inflation and the idea of planned economy. In other words, it is not because I feel that what I have said about the Roosevelt monetary policies in my previous book, or what I have said in this one about planned economy, requires the justification of presenting an alternative. It is because I have the hope that by exposing my own ideas to criticism I may perhaps stimulate other and more competent minds towards the constructive thought which our problem so urgently requires.

If our basic trouble is not a monetary trouble, and if we cannot therefore cure our ills by monetary means—if planned economy means the sacrifice of freedom and the sacrifice of progress, and if this price is too great a price to pay—what, then, are the elements of the course that we should follow?

It seems to me that in outlining such an alternative, one must first of all state the basic principles in which one believes, and upon which one intends to build the structure of an economic and social policy. For my part these principles can be stated very simply and very briefly:

1. I believe that this country should seek to maintain its traditional form of constitutional representative government, within the framework of which there is ample room for improvement.

2. I believe that we should maintain an economic order based upon the freedom of all individuals to think, to work, and to express themselves as they desire—an order in which each individual is free to improve his own circumstances through his own efforts so long as he does not in so doing transgress the rules of fair play or encroach upon the similar right of others.

3. I believe that it is incompatible with such a system to vest in a central government the arbitrary authority to regulate in its discretion production, prices, hours of work, and all the various details of our economic life.

4. I believe that the collective intelligence, expressed by a large number of transactions entered into for reasonable profit by a great number of people, is greater than the collected intelligence which can be assembled in any group of human beings composing a government bureaucracy.

5. Since the adoption of a planned economy must involve the abandonment of a democratic form of government, the abandonment of individual thought and expression, and the abandonment of freedom, I believe that if planned economy is to be adopted, it should be done only after the people have directly expressed themselves in favor of such a change. (I do not believe that the election of 1932 constituted such an expression by the people. See Democratic Platform of 1932.)

6. I believe that the primary cause of the world depression is to be found in the World War, and I am convinced that the primary economic necessity of the future is the prevention of war.

7. I believe that a policy of economic nationalism leads to war, and that a policy of international co-operation and the promotion of international trade leads to peace.

8. I believe that the only lasting help that can be given to our agricultural producers is to be found in a policy of deliberately increasing our imports by an intelligent downward revision of our tariff, in order that we may regain some of our lost export markets for primary raw materials.

9. I believe that within the limits of our traditional form of government and economy we should reform our laws and practices wherever it may be necessary to prevent unfair competition or the exploitation of the weak by the strong. For example:

(a) We need a reform of our banking system, both through a revision of the laws and by introducing a system of better training for our bankers, but we must avoid substituting government banking for private banking, and we must avoid political control of the money mechanism.

(b) We need a reform of our investment system, but we must guard against excessive government regulation which will impede the free flow of the savings of the people into legitimate requirements of business enterprise.

(c) We need certain reforms in our industrial system, such as the adoption of a satisfactory system of collective bargaining, and such as a system of old-age and unemployment insurance. On the other hand, we must be on our guard to see that private enterprise and not government enterprise remains the motive power, and that the free play of the forces of demand and supply as expressed in the price mechanism be not unduly interfered with.

10. I believe that the regulations that must undoubtedly be imposed upon a highly organized society should be in the nature of laws and established customs—preferably laws which express a general purpose to be interpreted by the courts rather than laws, of which we have all too many, which attempt to be over-specific and are therefore subject to technical evasion. I believe in regulation by laws and custom; I do not believe in regulation by discretionary authority vested in men.

Those are the general ideas upon which I believe our future course should be predicated.

Before proceeding to specific application, let me pause for a moment to make sure that we shall not fail to understand each other for want of a clear definition of terms.

Anyone who opposes government planning and regimentation is always confronted with the argument that under a free capitalistic system there is just as much regimentation—for instance, of the industrial workers—as there is under a government-directed economy. The only difference, it is claimed, is in the matter of who does the regimenting.

The answer, which is by now probably self-evident to the reader, is that one kind of regimentation arises from too much individual liberty—namely, the liberty of the strong to exploit the weak—whereas the other kind of regimentation destroys individual liberty and initiative, and therefore changes the whole basis of the economic and social structure.

The point that I am particularly anxious to make plain is:

That to oppose a government-directed economy does not mean to favor laissez-faire.

On the contrary, I for one should regret a typical laissez-faire reaction from the present tendencies almost as much as I should regret their unmodified continuation.

As conditions change, it is absurd to think that social and economic behavior can remain unaltered. My quarrel with the present trend is not that it seeks to modernize and improve the pattern of our lives, but that it seeks to accomplish this end in blind disregard of the realities of human nature and without a full understanding of what the system is that is to be improved.

Thus, if our system is faulty in that it permits too easily the concentration of great power in the hands of a few, we should seek to cure the defect by intelligent alterations in our laws. In doing this we must remember that no law can be effective if it lacks the support of public opinion.

No law can force people to be clean or honest if they don't want to be, but a wise law, wisely enforced and interpreted, can help people to maintain a standard of cleanliness or honesty upon which they have agreed.

Thus even a wise reform of the laws—if it is too far in advance of public opinion—may prove not only ineffective but actually may do a great deal of harm. For example, whether or not we should be better off without alcoholic beverages, the attempt to enforce prohibition when public opinion was not ready for it not only proved ineffective in carrying out its purpose, but contributed to a serious state of lawlessness throughout the country.

In addition to better laws we need also to improve and safeguard our judiciary system, so that all laws may be more intelligently interpreted and enforced. This will lead to a better understanding of our laws and their basic purposes.

Above all we must try to educate public opinion—that is, ourselves—away from the idea that every boy must have the ambition to become a millionaire, and every girl the ambition to marry one.

We must learn to respect work and right living—not power.

We must enlighten self-interest—not delude ourselves into thinking that we can kill it.

Most of us keep our own homes reasonably clean and neat. Most of us have learned that manners—little mutual concessions in our daily lives—make life more pleasant for all of us.

We must learn the same thing as citizens of a community, of a state, and of a country. And our country must learn the same thing in its relations with other countries.

There is no very great difference between personal manners and the duties of citizenship, nor between the rules of civilized conduct among individuals and the rules of civilized conduct among nations. The essence of civilization is the willingness to agree upon certain mutual concessions in the common interest of law and order; which means, in homely language, that if we go on picnics we must pick up our paper bags and bottles and not leave the rubbish of our daily lives to litter up the lives of others.

That end cannot be accomplished if, instead of making an effort ourselves, we hire a sort of combination garbage-man and policeman to pick up for us—unless we are willing to give this hired man the power to tell us where and when we may picnic, whom we may invite to come, and what we may have to eat and drink.

But it can be accomplished if we agree with each other not to leave things lying around and pay the policeman only to see that we live up to our agreements.

That is the essence of a democracy.

When the citizens of a democratic country become too weak or indolent to pick up things themselves, and complain about the resulting disorder, then the government begins to do the cleaning up instead of seeing that the citizens themselves do it. Once that begins, the hired man becomes the master.

That is the essence of bureaucracy and despotism.

CHAPTER IX

Let's Be Specific—Where We Can

I am no great believer in generalities. On the other hand, I am only too well aware that a great deal of harm is done by well-meaning persons who attempt to suggest specific plans and remedies for conditions concerning which they lack any real knowledge.

It is therefore only by way of presenting tentative suggestions designed to stimulate thought that I shall now attempt to make a few specific applications of the general philosophy outlined in the preceding chapter. In so doing I shall follow the outline of Chapter IV, in which I analyzed Senator Pittman's answer, rather than the ten general points laid down under the heading of basic principles.

The suggestions I have to offer fall under the headings of agriculture, industry, banking (which includes money), land and taxes, and foreign trade.

I. AGRICULTURE

In dealing with the farm problem the first thing to do is to make up our minds what that problem really is, and what it is that we want to do in order to cure it.

The farmer suffers, I think, not from any strange malady that has to do with our money or credit mechanism, but from the fact that he has lost a large part of his former market. Therefore his products have had to be forced upon an unwilling market at painfully low prices.

The farmer does not suffer primarily because the whole price level is lower than it was, let us say in 1926.

The farmer suffers from the fact that the price level for agricultural products has fallen further than the price level for other things. This means that the farmer gets less for his crops in terms of overalls, gasoline, farm implements, and so forth than he used to get.

Why has this happened?

For one thing it is because other nations will no longer buy our agricultural products in anything like the quantity they used to.

For another thing it is because our domestic purchasing power has declined on account of the depression.

And, finally, it is because the prices of manufactured goods and of services—such as transportation—are more rigid than the prices of primary raw materials, and therefore declined less rapidly under the impact of the depression.

Why did these three things happen?

The first two happened for a great many reasons, which I have tried to set forth briefly in the last chapter of my previous book. Boiled down, they happened for just one reason:

The fact that our present-day civilization has reached a point where we can no longer indulge in the waste of war without getting ourselves into a hopeless economic tangle.

I have pointed out briefly why this is so in the chapter entitled "Choose Your Ism Now." (See also Appendix, pages 181-4.)

The third thing happened because the prices of manufactured goods and of services contain a very large element of labor cost, and because the wages of labor never decline in a depression—nor rise in a boom—as fast as the prices of basic raw commodities. For that reason prices which contain a large element of labor cost, such as the price of building materials, always tend to lag behind the prices of raw or semi-raw materials.

Now then, if these are the things that ail the farmer, what can be done to remedy them?

1. We can set about regaining some of our lost foreign markets.

Bearing in mind that half the cotton, more than a third of the tobacco, and nearly one-fifth of the wheat produced in the United States have in the past been sold abroad, as well as a large part of the products of the fruit, dairy, and livestock industries, it is not difficult to see what the permanent loss of our export markets would mean to agriculture.

Nor is the agricultural population alone affected. Thirty per cent of our lubricating oil goes abroad, as well as thirty per cent of our lard, eight per cent of our lumber, and more than half of our resin and turpentine. The products of our fisheries and of many of our manufacturing industries are widely sold in foreign markets.

For this reason—namely, that the problem of foreign trade is not merely an agricultural problem—I shall deal with it separately a little later. But let me state here what seems to me an obvious conclusion:

Either we must face the displacement of an even larger part of our agricultural population, or we must set about recapturing at least a part of our lost foreign markets. Secretary Wallace posed this question very clearly some months ago. To date it has not been answered.

Secretary Wallace also pointed out that the consequences of trying to become self-sufficient included a degree of regimentation which would be highly distasteful to the American people—particularly to the farmer—and urged all of us to put our minds on this problem.

That is one thing we can do.

2. Another thing we can do to help the farmer is to set about rebuilding our domestic purchasing power, which is only another way of saying: shake off the depression and achieve recovery. The steps that must be taken in this direction lie outside of the field of agriculture itself. They are the steps that are necessary to bring about recovery in the country as a whole, more particularly in the field of industry and industrial employment. For that reason I shall not dwell upon them here, but I shall touch upon industrial recovery in the next section.

3. We can help the farmer by revising our antiquated method of taxing land. This, too, I shall treat in a separate section, because it concerns urban real estate as well as farm lands.

4. We can provide our farmers with better information as to their markets at home and abroad. We can try to help them overcome their disadvantage as against industry—not by having Government order them what to plant, how much to plant, and how to plant it—but by helping them reach their own conclusions on the basis of greater knowledge of their problem.

Those are the things that I think we can do for our farmers.

“But,” you may say, “isn’t there yet another way to help the farmer: namely, by helping him to cut down his production?”

My answer is: “No. Not in the long run.”

In the long run you cannot have more by making less. In the long run cutting down production means that all farmers must share a smaller market than they have had in the past, or that a lot of farmers will have to stop being farmers and become something else.

My answer is further that, while it may seem immediately helpful to raise prices by cutting production, such a course is loaded with danger—not because it may produce a famine, although that, too, may be the result—but because it may involve making permanent the loss of markets that might otherwise be regained.

For example, take the effect of crop curtailment among our Southern cotton-planters. Already the production of cotton in other countries has increased by about twenty per cent, which means that millions of bales that used to be supplied to other nations by our Southern states can now be obtained elsewhere.

In other words, by our own policy of restricting production we are stimulating the trend towards economic self-sufficiency which has developed to such a marked extent in other nations ever since the War. By our own policy we are making it more difficult for ourselves ever to recapture our lost foreign buyers.

There is another danger inherent in the present policy of crop-control, and that is that it may very easily produce discrepancies within the agricultural economy. In other words, not only are we suffering from a lack of balance between agriculture and industry, but I suspect that by arbitrary Government action we may be in the process of disturbing the balance within agriculture itself, such as—to name one example—the balance between mutton and pork.

Summing up, I have this deep-rooted conviction concerning the farmer: What he needs first of all is to live in an economic community in which there is the proper balance between agriculture and industry. That is largely a matter of foreign trade policy. What he needs beyond that is advice and information rather than instructions from a supreme command. He needs to be helped to see beyond the limits of his own fence-posts into the problem of the nation as a whole.

Nor does that apply only to the farmer. It applies to all of us.

What we need from our Government is a clear definition of our major problems, along with the demand that we think them out and express our views. What we need from our Government is a presentation of the facts that confront us, so that we ourselves, acting on the basis of enlightened self-interest—rather than stupid self-interest—may shape our common course in the future.

Then we shall not be asking our Government to perform miracles.

Then we shall not add to our distress by swallowing quack remedies.

Then also we shall learn, perhaps, not to eat green apples.

II. INDUSTRY

Just as in the case of agriculture, so with regard to industry I cannot attempt to do more than apply the general principles of a basic philosophy. I cannot offer any detailed plan for industrial recovery or for the future management of industry; I can only outline what seem to me a few essentials that must underlie any plan or procedure, if the fundamental nature of our American order is to remain unaltered. In addition I shall present a few specific practical suggestions, more by way of example of what can be done than by way of holding out a complete remedy.

First, as to recovery:

In industry, even more than in agriculture, it would appear to me that what we need is fuller and more accurate information upon which to base our individual judgments.

We do not need a government that makes our decisions for us, but we can be helped in making our decisions if we are put in full possession of all the facts that concern us, and if our Government pursues a course in its economic relations with other nations that is clear and consistent.

Here again we come upon the problem of lost markets, both domestic and foreign. Here again we have, in regard to one, the general problem of domestic recovery, and in regard to the other, the specific problem of a foreign trade policy. In addition we have the question of where and how industry is to make the sacrifices necessary, if for the sake of a better balanced economy and a generally higher living standard, we are to reduce our tariffs and let in more imports.

Foreign trade I shall, as I have said, treat separately.

So far as domestic recovery is concerned, it is my own belief that what we need primarily is less, not more activity by the Government. I shall touch upon future management—that is, reform—but first let me express this conviction in regard to the restoration of domestic purchasing power:

The less business has to wonder from here on how many new uncertainties it will have to surmount, the quicker will it regain its courage and its spirit of enterprise. And the sooner that happens, the sooner will private enterprise take off the Government's shoulders the major part of the unemployment burden.

As previously stated, over sixty per cent of the industrial unemployment is in those industries which make so-called durable goods—that is, goods which require the investment of savings, and which are purchased to use over a period of time, rather than to consume immediately. These industries cannot revive,

1. Until people have enough confidence in the future to want to invest their savings in new tools, new plants, new houses, and new mechanical equipment, and
2. Until the manufacturing industries themselves can obtain sufficient capital with which to make investments in plants and machinery. At present they cannot even obtain capital to replace obsolete and worn-out equipment.

Under the first heading we must remove, if we are to achieve recovery, such elements of uncertainty as:

- (a) The large question-mark which pertains at present to the future character and value of our money—not only because of an uncertain and experimental monetary policy, but because of the doubt which arises in the mind of any thinking citizens as to the ultimate effect of our vast Government expenditures.

(b) The equally large question-mark which pertains to future taxation.

(c) The uncertainty as to whether this Government really believes in Federal regulation and control of all business, all profits, and all incomes, or has only taken the steps it has taken in this direction because it felt they were necessary to induce recovery.

There are many other minor uncertainties, but these three seem to me the most important.

Under the second heading—that is, the ability of industry to acquire capital from the investment market—we find ourselves confronted with much the same elements of retardation. The same unknown factors that prevent a man from buying a new ice-box militate even more strongly against his investing his savings in bonds or mortgages.

In addition there are the new Securities Act, the Stock Exchange Act, and the general disruption of the machinery by which seekers of capital formerly obtained it from the investment market. This, however, is largely water over the dam, for better or worse—and on the whole, I think, for better. But the fact that a basically sound reform was rushed through hastily and without the necessary study, at a time when industry needed the support of the capital markets as it never needed it before, did definitely retard recovery, and is still retarding it.

I can only repeat: so far as recovery is concerned, what business needs is to be let alone to recover, and to have the Government-created uncertainties removed.

We are not, however, solely concerned with recovery. And we admitted at the outset a certain sympathy for the belief that, if we did not reform while we still felt somewhat shaky, we should probably slip back into smug contentment with outworn codes of social and economic behavior.

What, then, are the reforms that we should seek to introduce in industry?

A. In my previous book I suggested one such reform: namely, social insurance. This idea has, of course, been discussed by many people for years and put into practice in many countries. Just before the adjournment of Congress, the President announced his intention of working out a plan of old-age and unemployment insurance during the next few months.

The problem—which is really two problems—merits the most careful and deliberate study before any plan is adopted. The Railroad Retirement Act, passed at the last session of Congress, is a typical example of how such legislation should not be passed. For one thing, there is grave doubt in the minds of many eminent lawyers as to the constitutionality of this Act. For another thing, the Act as it stands at present may easily result in the upsetting of existing pension plans and in consequent hardship upon the present beneficiaries of such plans.

As to old-age insurance, a basic question which must be decided is whether such pensions are a matter for Federal legislation or state legislation.

Another basic question is whether old-age pensions are to be entirely at government expense or partly on a contributory basis.

Still another question is how the Federal or state governments, as the case may be, are to raise the funds out of which old-age pensions are to be paid. This requires a revision of the Federal income and inheritance taxes in so far as the Federal Government is concerned, and revision of the general property tax in so far as the state governments are concerned. I shall touch upon the latter briefly in a subsequent section of this chapter.

As to unemployment insurance—or, more properly, unemployment compensation—this problem is even more complicated. There are various systems now in use in various European countries. There is one state in this country—namely, Wisconsin—which has a plan in use, other states are studying it, and there are various industrial concerns which have plans of their own, such as, for example, the General Electric Co.

Some of the questions which must be studied and decided are:

(1) Who should contribute to such a plan? The Employer? The Employee? The State Government? The Federal Government?

(2) In what proportion should the contributions be made by the various contributors?

(3) Should the plan be compulsory on all workers, and, if not, which workers are to be excluded? (For example: domestic servants, agricultural workers, Government employees.)

(4) Should unemployment benefits be paid for an indefinite time or only for a fixed maximum period?

(5) Upon what relation to wages earned is unemployment compensation to be paid?

I mention these questions not as a complete statement of the problem, but merely to show how carefully the whole matter must be studied if an intelligent plan is to be arrived at.

It would seem to me, although my opinion is not that of an expert, that:

a. The employer, the employee, and the Government should all contribute. I cannot presume to judge in what proportion these contributions should be made. The employee should contribute because he should receive unemployment compensation as a right and not as charity. The employer should contribute because it is obviously at least partly his responsibility to see that employment in his industry is stabilized as much as possible. And it seems to me that the Government should contribute because the community as a whole will derive a benefit from avoiding the evils of unemployment.

b. It seems to me also most desirable that the plan adopted should not provide for the accumulation of separate funds in various industrial units. The trouble with such funds is that they must be invested, and almost invariably it will be found that when the rainy day comes, the funds will be impaired or, to say the least, have become illiquid. For this reason it would seem desirable to me that the contributory payments by employer and employee be made to the State or the Federal Government, as the case may be, in the nature of a tax. In consideration of having received this tax, the Government would then undertake to make the unemployment payments. The effect of such a scheme, as I have pointed out in my previous book, is to retard somewhat an excessive industrial boom and likewise to dampen the violence of a depression.

c. Such a scheme also leads in the direction of having what might be called normal unemployment taken care of by the contributions of employers and employees, whereas abnormal employment, such as that which results from a protracted depression, would fall upon the Government and would be taken care of under the heading of emergency relief expenditure.

The purpose of this necessarily superficial statement of the problem is twofold:

1. To point out that much can be done along the lines of social insurance to bring about a greater stability of employment and purchasing power, and to avoid the excessive hardships inflicted upon the working classes by a depression. And

2. To stress the fact that the problem is an exceedingly complicated one, which requires the most exhaustive study and is ill suited to hasty legislative action.

B. I do not pretend to a knowledge of labor questions, but it seems to me to require no particular knowledge to see—although many think otherwise—that the interests of the employer and of labor are fundamentally the same, whereas the elements of conflict between them are largely a matter of insufficient understanding on both sides.

It seems to me that the chief objective should be to develop machinery for reaching a better understanding of the facts of the co-operative enterprise, such as its profits, business, and prospects, for the purpose of seeing: whether there is a fair division of earnings between capital and labor; whether such earnings could be increased by the more effective use of capital or labor; and, if so, how the increased earnings should be divided. The character of the machinery should be such as to insure that the initial approach will be a study of common problems rather than a settling of antagonistic disputes.

In a large modern industrial corporation the management occupies a twofold fiduciary capacity:

It represents the interests of those who provide the tools and machinery of production—that is, those who provide the capital for the enterprise, and

It represents the interests of those who use these tools and devote their physical and mental energies to the turning out of the finished product—that is, the employees.

In this twofold capacity the management must therefore protect capital to the extent of giving it safety and a reasonable return. Unless it does this, more capital will not be forthcoming when needed to supply new plants and new tools. On the other hand, the management must pay its employees, not as little as it can, but as much as it can without raising the cost of production to such an extent that it cannot compete with other similar enterprises.

The recognition of this twofold responsibility is a comparatively recent development. Obviously, when the manager of a business is also its proprietor, he is likely to overlook his responsibility towards labor because, instead of being in a fiduciary relationship towards capital, he, himself, provides the capital and represents his own self-interest. The labor problem is therefore usually more difficult to deal with in a proprietary business than in a concern which is owned by a large number of shareholders.

In recent years much progress has been made, particularly in the large corporations, along the line of developing the idea of employee representation in the management, and it seems to me that in the further development of this thought lies the solution of the whole problem. The chief difficulty with most employee-representation plans today is that there is no element of finality for settling disputes. Granted that there cannot be complete finality—such as would be achieved if all disputes were submitted to a labor tribunal whose decisions would be compulsorily enforced, because that in effect would be an interference with the freedom of labor—it seems to me that much could be accomplished by enacting a law to prohibit strikes until after a dispute had been taken before an impartial body and both sides of the case had been thoroughly aired in the light of public opinion.

I am not sure that such a law should not, in addition, completely outlaw sympathetic strikes and general strikes, which harm the whole community, and harm labor most of all.

In any case, if we were to provide the machinery by which such disputes as may occur would first be thoroughly ventilated before an impartial body, we should have taken a long step in preventing strikes of all kinds. We must guard against anything that creates or stresses the cleavage between industrial management and industrial labor. Such cleavages force industrial management into the position of representing only capital, instead of stressing its twofold and equal responsibility.

C. I have probably made it clear that I do not believe in an attempt to fix wages, hours, or prices by Government intervention. (There is much to be said for a minimum wage from the social point of view, even though it is economically unsound for the Government to interfere even to this extent. But there is nothing to be said for fixing wages other than declaring a minimum.)

I have just as little faith in an attempt to fix wages, hours, or prices by vesting power over industry in some central body of its own choosing. So long as human nature remains what it is, I have more faith in the aggregate of free human intelligence than in the collected intelligence of any given group—no matter how that group is chosen.

But there are, I think, many things that can be done by trade associations that will make for better industrial management. There are things that can be done to eliminate unfair competition, without eliminating healthy competition and thus fostering monopolies.

The question of what constitutes unfair competition should not be decided by Government bureaus and officials. It should be decided by the real parties at interest.

Unfair practices by industry are, broadly speaking, of three kinds: taking advantage of competitors, taking advantage of labor, and taking advantage of the consumer. In the long run none of them pays. Once that is understood the major part of the problem will be solved.

Until it is understood, the consumer must be protected by intelligent laws to prevent monopolistic exploitation; labor must be protected—and incidentally the employer as well—by a system of labor tribunals; and industry must be protected within itself against unfair competition.

The latter is very largely a matter of information, which can be supplied by trade associations, without any Government intervention whatsoever. Trade associations can provide their membership with full information concerning the industry as a whole, and also concerning the rate of output, hours of work, wages, and prices of each member of the industry. There is a natural resistance to telling one's competitor about one's business, but to my mind that resistance is, under present-day conditions, unintelligent. Any industry will be better off as a whole if its various units can make their plans upon a basis of full knowledge of all the relevant facts.

The cotton-manufacturers tried it just recently. Give the N.R.A. credit for that. The result was somewhat unsatisfactory, because they could not compel the converters—that is, printers and dyers—to join in giving the information. That, of course, put the cloth-manufacturers at a disadvantage. But if the converters were to join the association, the cotton industry as a whole would be better off, knowing, as it would, just how much unsold inventory there was on hand at all times. This is merely one example. Industry can and should do for itself many of the things that are now done by the N.R.A.—not in the way of centralized control and management, but in the way of providing the basis for more intelligent individual management.

D. It occurs to me that quite a little could be done for industry by developing the commodity exchanges. Again, let us take the cotton industry as an example.

Cotton—the raw material—is a seasonal crop. Therefore the cotton mill has to buy all or most of its raw material in the late summer, which means that it has to take a speculative “long position” throughout most of the year, unless it sells future cotton contracts on the exchange. This is what is known as “hedging.”

Unbleached cotton cloth in various grades—commonly called “gray-goods”—is the standard output of the cotton mill. As the gray-goods are manufactured and sold, the “hedges” in raw cotton are gradually liquidated.

Now, if the mill could sell future contracts in gray-goods, which it cannot do today, the hedge would be a very much more satisfactory protection. The reason for this—which may not be obvious to the layman—is that the prices of raw cotton and gray-goods do not necessarily move exactly together, so that a mill which has protected its inventory by selling raw cotton futures may nevertheless find itself partially unprotected if gray-goods decline in price more than raw cotton declines.

But if the mill could sell future contracts in gray-goods, the protection would be complete.

All that is necessary is that the commodity exchanges start dealings in gray-goods contracts.

The same thing is true of crude oil and gasoline, and could probably be applied in several other industries.

I mention this idea—which is not original with me—as an example of how many of the unnecessary risks in industry can be eliminated—in this case by providing more adequate facilities for “hedging” inventories that are in process of manufacture.

The textile-manufacturer who suggested this thought to me not long ago was doing the kind of thinking that is needed. Henry Ford has done that kind of thinking.

We shall achieve more “security” by the exercise of what we used to call American ingenuity than by all the complicated bureaucratic planning and regulating that can be done by any central body.

E. Finally I think we must guard against letting the individual units of our industrial structure become too large and too ramified. I say this partly because I suspect that the very size and ramification of our units has made them less sensitive to economic trends, and partly, too, because I feel that there is a limit to the size and diversification of any enterprise that can be successfully managed by human beings. Much of our technological progress and much of the improvement in the quality of our products are due to the research work and the better methods of distribution which only a large organization can afford. It would be a mistake, therefore, to fall into the error of seeking to go to the other extreme of too much decentralization, because that will result in slower progress, a lower grade of quality, and higher distribution costs. Somewhere between the two extremes there lies a medium for which we must strive. We shall find the answer only from experience.

In the end, it will be the human beings that count, rather than the things they make.

But this end can be arrived at only by a gradual process of enlightenment, and can certainly never be attained by the regimentation of industry and labor under a political bureaucracy.

3. MONEY AND BANKING

This is perhaps the one field in which the reader might expect from me a reasonably detailed specific proposal. If so, I am afraid the reader will be disappointed. I intend to make no such proposal for two reasons:

1. I know just enough about money and banking to be quite sure of only one thing: namely, that I know very little—and, in fact, that all of us really know very little. And

2. I have covered this ground—in so far as I felt that I could cover it—in my previous book.

What I shall attempt to do here is merely to apply to this subject the same general principles which must, I believe, be applied to every phase of our economic life—that is, the principles of democratic government and a free economic order, regulated in the interest of the greatest good for the greatest number by laws and customs rather than by discretionary authority.

The application of these principles leads in the first place to one perfectly definite general conclusion:

We do not want—if we can avoid it—Government control of the money mechanism; but we do want our money mechanism to be such as to give no unfair advantage to any class or group of our population—and we do want it to give us currency money and bank money (deposits) that we can trust.

Why not, then, let the Government control and operate it?

Because, once more, we do not believe that the maximum of intelligent management can be obtained by expecting any little group of human beings to be all-wise and all-powerful.

Because, once more, the individuals in government under a democratic system are here today and gone tomorrow; and—which is more important—because while they are “here today” they are thinking of nothing so much as of avoiding being “gone tomorrow.”

Can you imagine what it would be like if the Government owned and operated our banks? If bank officers were appointed like post-office officials? If bank clerks got their jobs through political patronage?

You can perhaps have such a system if you have only one political party—if you have, as they have in Italy, Germany, Austria, and Russia, a totalitarian state. But can you picture what would happen under our system, when one party goes out and the other comes into power?

There is, however, another and perhaps more basic reason to avoid Government control and operation:

A bank has, broadly speaking, two functions: to provide a safe refuge for money that is temporarily idle; and to lend the money so entrusted to it by one part of the community to those members of the community who have a legitimate temporary need for it.

If a bank makes bad loans—that is, loans that are not promptly repaid—the safety of the depositors is endangered. In order to provide a margin of safety for such mistakes we insist that a bank must have a certain amount of its own capital, which will be lost first, before anything happens to the depositor.

Under such a system of banks operating on private capital the bank officer, who makes the loans, is dependent for his job upon the owners of the capital—that is, the shareholders. If he is careless in making loans, the shareholders' capital is impaired, and he will soon be called up before the board of directors. If, on the other hand, he is over-cautious, the bank will become unpopular with the community, will not make satisfactory earnings, and again the officer will be called to account by his directors.

That is the basic theory of "checks and balances" which is inherent in a private banking system. It is not a perfect system, because human nature is not perfect. In this country, moreover, the system has always operated under a twofold handicap, in that we have had, not one system, but forty-nine uncorrelated systems, and in that we have made it too easy for anybody to become a banker.

But now we see what happens when you substitute the Government for the interests of the shareholders.

The loaning officer is responsible—not to a board of directors representing the owners of the capital—but to a political superior. His job and his chief's job are to please the public. If they make bad loans, that does not matter much, because it will take months before the vast Government machinery makes anyone aware of the fact that a bank, let us say in Kankakee, is losing money. But if the bank in Kankakee exercises due caution and turns down a few would-be borrowers that are not entitled to credit, what happens?

Wires and letters begin to go to the Senators and Representatives from Illinois, complaining that the bank in Kankakee won't give reasonable credit to Joe Doaks, who has always been a staunch voter of the X ticket, while Joe Zilch, who contributed to the Z campaign, is actually getting accommodation.

The result is inevitable:

A system of Government-owned and operated banks—which many people think is the system we want—will cost the Government (which means all of us) a pretty penny, because such a system will unavoidably be lax in the granting of credit.

Nor is the expense the worst of it.

Such a system provides almost unimaginable opportunities for the political spoils system to give the party in power an opportunity to remain there indefinitely. I know of no more effective way to accomplish the political prostitution of the entire country.

And even that is not all.

The argument for “nationalizing credit” is that the Government would be a more generous provider of credit facilities than the banking Shylocks of the past. I think I have made it plain in the foregoing that I fully agree that it would be more “generous,” but I deny that its “generosity” would benefit the country as a whole. Not just because the “generosity” would be politically abused.

One of the most useful functions that a banker performs for his community—if he is a good banker—is that of acting as a “No-man.” He is the laboratory technician under whose microscope the new ideas and enterprises of the community must pass.

While it is true that bankers have frequently, by lack of vision or courage, retarded some development that should have been helped along, the cases where the opposite is true have been, I think, more numerous. Certainly in this country bankers have failed in their duty to be cautious far more frequently and disastrously than they have failed to provide credit where it was legitimately required.

If it is true that most private bankers, with their own capital at stake, were unable to see what was happening in the years leading up to 1929, and were unable to say "No" when they should have; if it is true that the violence of the depression that began in 1929 was largely due to the excessive inflation of credit which had preceded it; and if such warnings as were given against continuing to be so "generous" with credit came—as they did come—not from Government, but from a few courageous private bankers—

Then what hope is there that a Government banking system will accomplish any result except to make matters infinitely worse?

As I have previously pointed out in analyzing Senator Pittman's article, the Administration has not as yet taken a clear position as to whether it believes in Government banking—as Senator Pittman does—or whether it considers the steps already taken in this direction under the stress of emergency as steps that must ultimately be retraced.

If we are to retain a private banking system, two things must be undone:

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation must gradually be taken out of its investment in the capital structure of some six thousand banks. (Which does not mean that it was wrong to make such investments to tide over the emergency.) And

The so-called deposit insurance plan must, if there has to be such a plan at all, become an insurance plan and not simply an unlimited guarantee of all banks for each other. It must become a plan under which each bank may know for what it is liable, and under which the depositor, who wants to be insured, pays at least a part of the premium. Otherwise there will be no difference between good banks and bad, and no incentive to the development of banking as a profession.

Besides undoing these two steps, there is a great deal of positive action required, in order to modernize our hopelessly antiquated system. I shall not attempt here to state what this action should be. I shall merely list a few of the many matters that seem to me to need attention.

Nor is this list intended to be a full summary of all the questions that should be studied. It is intended only to make the reader aware of the great mass of material that must be digested if we are ever really to set up a money mechanism "adequate to meet the necessities of modern economic life."

No one person can or should attempt to work out a complete plan of banking reform and then seek to get it adopted. What should be done is that a commission should be appointed by the Government to study the whole question of money and banking, to conduct open hearings, and, having ventilated every possible angle of the question, to submit its findings to the President and to Congress. On the basis of such a report the President would then be in a position to submit to Congress the necessary draft legislation, and Congress would be in a position to act upon it.

Here are some of the things that such a commission would have to consider:

I. MONEY

1. Is the power over the issuance of currency to be vested
 - a. in a non-political authority on which both Government and private business are represented, (such as the Federal Reserve System was intended to be) or
 - b. in the Secretary of the Treasury (as it now is) or
 - c. in a non-political privately owned but Government-chartered Central Bank (Bank of England), or
 - d. in a Government-owned and operated Central Bank?
2. Is the currency to be redeemable
 - a. in gold, or

- b. in silver, or
 - c. in both, or a combination of both?
- 3. If the currency is to be redeemable, is it to be redeemable
 - a. in coin, or
 - b. in bars of bullion, or
 - c. in bullion for export only?
- 4. Is a fixed ratio to gold to be re-established, and, if so, under what conditions?
- 5. If not, under what conditions and by whom is the ratio to gold to be changed from time to time?
- 6. Should one uniform currency be established for the country in place of the various kinds now circulating, and, if so, what should it be?
- 7. If the currency is to be irredeemable "managed" currency, upon what terms is it to be issued and how managed?

II. RE-DISCOUNT BANK

- 1. Is the re-discount function of the Federal Reserve System to remain as it is, or to be changed? If changed, how?
- 2. Is the ownership of the Federal Reserve Banks to remain where it is, or to be transferred? If transferred, to whom?
- 3. Is the composition of the Federal Reserve Board to remain as it is or be changed? If changed, how?
- 4. Are any other changes to be made in the Federal Reserve System, such as, for instance, in its open-market operations? If so, what changes?

III. BANKING

1. Is there to be a Government-owned and operated banking system? If so, what system?
2. If not, what changes are to be made in the private banking system? For example:

A. Is there to be a unification of the forty-nine different banking systems that we now have? If so, is this to be accomplished

- (1) by actually merging the systems into one system, or
- (2) by compulsory membership of state banks in the Federal Reserve System, or
- (3) by making the laws of all the states conform to a uniform pattern?

B. Is there to be branch banking? If so, is it to be

- (1) nation-wide,
- (2) state-wide, or
- (3) regional?

C. What are to be the capital requirements of a bank in relation to its liabilities?

D. Are commercial banks to be allowed to take savings accounts? If so, on what basis?

E. Are commercial banks to be allowed to do a trust business? If so, on what basis?

F. Are commercial banks to be allowed to underwrite new securities which they are permitted by law to own?

G. Are savings banks to be compelled to mutualize?

H. Must savings banks belong to the Federal Reserve System? If not, may they belong to it?

I. Is there to be a plan of deposit insurance? If so, what plan? What banks are compelled to belong to it?

J. Can anyone become a bank officer? If not, what qualifications are to be demanded?

The reader will agree, I think, that it would be of little value if I were to set forth my own answers to the various questions enumerated. If a commission were appointed, and if I were summoned before that commission as a witness, I should be glad to state my views and argue for them, knowing that whatever I might say would be weighed in the balance against the testimony of other witnesses, and that, when I had heard or read the testimony of others, I might easily change my own views in this or that particular. Without such a test of mind against mind, and idea against idea, I do not feel warranted in assuming that such views as I hold at the present moment are of any particular value.

There is one phase of the problem on which, however, I should like to state a personal conviction, without being very sure where that conviction leads as a practical matter. This has to do with the last question enumerated in the preceding list:

"Can anyone become a bank officer? If not, what qualifications are to be demanded?"

On June 26, 1934 I was asked to address a group of some fifteen hundred college seniors, assembled in Newark, N. J., at a "Choosing-A-Career Conference." My subject was to be the "banking business."

Almost the first thing I said in my address was that in my judgment there no longer was any "banking business"; that, on the other hand, there was a banking profession, which was still so much in its infancy that one might almost say that it had not yet been born.

Of this I am firmly convinced. Not that we have not had many bankers in the past who have conformed to the true professional standard of public service—we have had, and have today many of them—but, on the whole, those who go into banking still go into it with the primary idea of making money, instead of with the philosophy of the professional public servant.

And, on the whole, our bankers are insufficiently trained in those very subjects which should form the background of their activity.

I have included the full text of my address on this subject in the Appendix (page 196); again, not so much because it offers any concrete solution as because it may suggest to others how we should proceed along these lines.

Bankers are human beings just like other human beings. As such they will always be motivated by self-interest. I have no such beautiful idealism as might lead me to think that human nature will change in this respect. But I do believe that an enlightened self-interest will make many bankers see their jobs in a new and different light—and that therein lies the hope for the future.

IV. LAND AND TAXES

In all our efforts to overcome the depression and achieve recovery, it seems to me that we have very largely overlooked the importance of land values, even though probably half of our national wealth is to be found in land and what has been built upon it. The physical possession of such property is the real foundation upon which our economic order rests, and yet we have been far more concerned with the superstructure of industrial values and security values than we have with the foundation.

One of the things to which we have paid the most attention, for example, is our banking system—not that we have so far paid it the right kind of attention—but we have almost ignored the fact that the shrinkage of real-estate values was one of the greatest contributing causes to the collapse of our banking system.

Moreover, such consideration as we have given to the real-estate problem has been in the nature of emergency patchwork; by preventing foreclosures, extending Federal aid to distressed mortgage debtors, and the extension of Government credit on real estate, we have endeavored to counteract the effects of the shrinkage in values. But we have done nothing to get at the cause of the shrinkage.

What is the cause of the shrinkage?

Most people would probably tell you that it is the result of an excessive real-estate boom, excessive speculation, and too rapid development. In saying that they would be entirely correct, but they would not, as I see it, have penetrated to the root of the matter.

Why have we had real-estate booms and exaggerated speculation?

This question has been very ably analyzed by Mr. Richard T. Ely, President of the Institute for Economic Research, Inc., and of the School of Land Economics. It has also been interestingly discussed by Dr. Harold M. Groves of the University of Wisconsin, and by Mr. Stevenson, the Director of the Bureau of Municipal Research in Los Angeles.

These and other authorities on the subject seem to be agreed that the basic cause of the trouble is to be found in the antiquated methods of taxation applied to real estate by our various state and municipal authorities.

As any property-owner knows only too well, the type of general property tax in vogue in this country tends actually to destroy the value of the property from which it seeks to derive a revenue. This is because we tax such property not in relation to the income it produces, but in relation to its hypothetical capital value.

The result is that we think of an investment in real estate terms of capital appreciation, instead of in terms of fixed income.

That is why people buy land and try to sell it off in subdivisions to other people, who do not realize that they are paying a price which will never justify itself in terms of income.

That is why we had a Florida land boom. No one thought he could derive a return from an investment in Florida real estate that would pay for carrying it. Everyone thought he could make money by selling to someone else at a higher price.

The general property tax as applied in this country does two things:

1. It promotes real-estate speculation and forces the premature development of land, and
2. It accentuates and protracts a depression by forcing the property-owner who loses his income to sell his property because he can no longer pay the taxes. Such forced liquidation destroys the real-estate market, makes real-estate loans unsound, and endangers the safety of banks, savings banks, and insurance companies.

We are about the only major survival in this respect. Most European countries have long ago recognized the evils of a general property tax and now levy taxes upon real estate in proportion to the income it produces. The British, for example, who certainly do not spare their taxpayers, have worked out a system to protect their real-property-owners. So have the French. So have the Germans. In any of those countries, if you lose most of your income, you are still able to keep the roof over your head by paying a relatively small property tax. On the other hand the income you may derive from rents is subject to heavy taxation.

The problem is rendered unusually difficult in this country by the fact that real-estate taxes are not Federal taxes, and that the Federal Government has nothing to do with the matter. The reform will have to come from the various states and municipalities. This again is difficult, not only because of the large number of political entities involved, but because our states and cities derive most of their revenue from the general property tax, and, if it is modernized, will have to seek their funds from other sources.

That leads us to the more general aspects of the whole question of tax reform, which is a subject that does not lend itself to cursory treatment.

It is, I think, obvious to most of us that—quite apart from the suggested modernization of the general property tax—the present enormous government expenditures will have to result very soon in much heavier taxation than we have had so far. It is perhaps less obvious, but equally true, that this increased burden will have to be borne by the people as a whole, and that any idea of “soaking the rich” is illusory, because in the end it will only “soak the poor” that much harder. No one has pointed this out more clearly than President Roosevelt in his campaign speech at Pittsburgh on October 19, 1932.

Furthermore, even if government expenditure is reduced—of which there is as yet no indication—a program of old-age pensions and unemployment compensation will add a considerable item to the burden of the taxpayers.

So far we have concerned ourselves but little with the question of raising the money that we are so enthusiastically borrowing and spending. We shall have to concern ourselves with it soon; and it would pay us, I think, to make a careful study of what the British have done, since they are now apparently over the worst of their expenditures and on the way towards reduced taxation. Certainly their income and inheritance taxes, as well as their method of taxing property, are far more effective than ours.

My purpose here is to draw attention to the importance of an intelligent tax reform, rather than to present a solution. The proper solution can only be found by exhaustive study.

V. FOREIGN TRADE

Almost without exception the efforts made by the Administration to combat the depression have so far been limited to the domestic sphere. Without in any way minimizing the importance of these endeavors, it is difficult to see how they can lead to the establishment of a well-balanced economy unless they are supplemented by a determined attempt to develop a consistent and intelligent policy in regard to foreign trade.

We have already noted the importance of foreign markets to agriculture and industry.

It is scarcely necessary to point out the importance of foreign trade to our merchant marine, our longshoremen, and our railways.

Compared to other nations, we are remarkably self-sufficient in natural resources and manufacturing ability, but we are nevertheless dependent upon other nations for such things as rubber, silk, tea, coffee, sugar, tin, and wood-pulp. Furthermore, industrial progress and the progressive development of our living standards depend to a very large extent upon foreign trade. As manufacturing processes become more complicated, a constantly greater variety of raw materials is needed, many of which—such as, for example, Swedish iron ore—can only be obtained in other countries.

It is perfectly obvious, I think, that the more civilization advances, the more the various nations become dependent upon each other. That is one reason why war has become so disastrous to our economic machinery. That is why it is so necessary that we must repair the ravages of the last war, and seek to free international trade from the tangle of artificial restrictions which now encumber it.

Then, too, if we recognize as a fact that war is the one thing which our economic order cannot withstand without serious collapse—if we agree that future wars must at all costs be avoided—there is no better insurance against political animosities than the removal of economic irritations, wherever it is possible to remove them.

Finally, if we are agreed that economic nationalism must mean extreme regimentation and the end of democracy—if we are agreed that our traditional American order is to be preserved—then again we cannot afford to delay longer the whole-hearted effort to develop an orderly program of mutually advantageous trade relationships with other nations.

What are the essentials of such a program?

1. We must face the fact that we cannot export more of our goods and services unless we are willing to import more as well.

2. We cannot increase our imports unless we revise our tariff downward. We must therefore set about reducing our tariff at once.

3. We must face the fact that a depreciated currency is the most drastic of all import restrictions, except an outright embargo. In revising our tariff we must therefore take into consideration that this Administration has, by depreciating the dollar forty per cent in terms of foreign exchange, actually increased our tariff by a like percentage, except as against nations whose currencies have likewise been depreciated.

4. We must realize that international agreements to reduce tariffs, import quotas, and other restrictions can only be made effective if they are accompanied by international agreements to stabilize currencies.

5. We must face the fact that we have in the past made excessive foreign loans, which can only be repaid if the debtor countries sell more than they buy.

6. We must learn to correlate our foreign lending operations in the future to the realities of our foreign trade relations; and we must seek gradually to work out the mistakes of the past by funding frozen credits wherever we can justify such operations on the basis of mutually co-operative trade and currency agreements.

The whole problem is a highly complicated and in many respects an extremely technical one. It requires for one thing a greater understanding of such things as the "trade balance" and the "balance of payments" than can be expected of the average citizen. Nor is it necessary for our present purposes to delve too deeply into the detailed methods by which we should seek to accomplish the purposes above outlined. Briefly, the development of such a program requires:

1. The determination of the amount by which we desire to increase our imports.

2. A careful study to determine where tariff reductions should and should not be made in the interest of the nation as a whole.

3. The development of international agreements to stabilize currencies, and to increase international trade by reciprocal concessions.

4. A careful study of the international balance of payments with a view towards determining the best method of liquidating existing international loans, and of developing an intelligent policy of foreign lending in the future; such lending to be undertaken only where consistent with an enlightened national self-interest, and where loans can be made for essentially productive purposes.

All that we have done so far in this direction is to make a few futile gestures—such as attending the London Economic Conference.

If we are to avoid the consequences of a steadily dwindling international trade—and I do not hesitate to say that these consequences include reduced standards of living everywhere, the probability of wars, and the certainty of extreme regimentation—then it is high time that we should do something more than render lip-service to this problem.

The time has come when we must take an entirely new view of our whole foreign trade relationships—a view based upon the carefully ascertained interests of the nation as a whole, which demand nothing so much as the achievement of a better balance between agriculture and industry at home. This balance can only be achieved by determined and consistent action in the international sphere.

Similarly we must take a new view in regard to the methods by which we formulate our policies and carry them out. In the past our policies have been determined by hit or miss horse-trading and mutual back-scratching between various sectional and special industrial interests. As a result it has made very little difference in the recent past whether the traditionally high-tariff Republican party or the traditionally low-tariff Democratic party has been in power. In either case the horse-trading process has meant that the tariff wall has been raised.

Nor do I think that this can be changed so long as the details of tariff policy are determined by Congress.

For this reason it is, I believe, essential that this function be delegated to the Executive, provided that two important safeguards are preserved:

1. Congress should not delegate, but should itself determine the general framework of a foreign trade policy; that is, Congress should decide in round figures by how much it is desirable to increase our annual imports for the sake of increasing exports—which is another way of saying that Congress should be the one to determine how great a sacrifice industry must make for the sake of agriculture and for the national interest as a whole.

This has nothing to do with determining how such a general policy is to be worked out—whether, for instance, the tariff on sugar or the tariff on Scotch worsteds is to be lowered. That is the function that should be delegated to the Executive. But,

2. Congress should delegate the power to apply the general principles of the policy it has determined only after the fullest possible investigation and report by a modernized Tariff Commission.

And Congress should require an annual detailed report from the Executive and the Commission, on the basis of which it would re-determine the policy for the succeeding year.

The limited tariff-bargaining power delegated to the President at the last session of Congress was a step in this direction, but two things must be observed about that piece of legislation:

1. It conveyed only a limited power for a limited time.
2. It did not provide that Congress should itself determine the general framework of the policy, nor attempt to safeguard the executive power delegated as above outlined.

As a result the major question remains unanswered.

Congress has not decided what our foreign policy is to be; it has merely, for the time being, passed the buck to the President. And there has been no intimation from the White House that any definite general policy is being formulated there. The indications are more in the direction that we are to pursue a policy of tariff bargaining with individual nations as opportunities arise—which means a hit or miss procedure, with no clearly defined purpose upon which either agriculture or industry can base their calculations for the future.

It means also that we shall probably continue to ignore the importance of triangular trade, and that, in seeking to make bargains to our own advantage, we shall overlook the importance of stimulating world trade as a whole.

This is perhaps an unduly pessimistic appraisal of the present situation. For all I know, a policy may be in the process of formulation. For all I know, a study may be in progress, to determine which industries are at present over-protected, which special interest groups have in the past been too successful at log-rolling.

But the fact remains that this is a basic question which, as Secretary Wallace pointed out, concerns the American people as a whole, and which should be decided by the people as a whole through their duly elected representatives. It is a question which transcends all party and sectional interests, because it goes to the root of our whole social, political, and economic problem.

And the fact remains that the people as a whole are not being stimulated to study and answer the question, but rather are in the process of having it answered—or left unanswered—for them.

NOTE. For some reason almost everyone who expresses a view on the subject of foreign trade tends to become slightly hysterical on one side or the other. I am fully aware of the fact that my own point of view may be biased in favor of the importance of world trade as a factor in domestic recovery. I have stated that I believe we should set about reducing our trade barriers, so that, by importing more, we shall be able to export more, and so that we may contribute to the revival of world trade as a whole.

If this view is held wrong, then I say this:

It does not matter nearly so much whether we have a high tariff or a low tariff, or even whether our dollar is at par or at sixty per cent of par, as it matters that the various barriers to trade should remain more or less fixed over a reasonable period of time.

Trade can adjust itself pretty much to any set of circumstances.

What kills trade between nations is the constant alteration of the obstacles which it must surmount. If we decide against reducing our tariffs and choose to follow the path of greater national self-sufficiency—which I should regret—then it would still remain essential to our own self-interest that we should attempt as soon as possible to end the present period of tariff, quota, and currency warfare between nations. And, since our present system of tariff-making is a system which inherently leads to constant upward revision of our tariff structure, it would still remain essential to alter that system along the lines suggested.

VI. SUMMARY

What do these specific recommendations amount to?

1. They mean that we must apply to agriculture, industry, banking, foreign trade, and to all the aspects of our economic life, the underlying principles of an economic order based upon freedom to enter into transactions in the hope of reasonable profit—this freedom to be circumscribed only by such laws as we agree upon with each other, in order to achieve a better balanced structure, and in order to prevent abuse.

2. It follows that, whatever we do with respect to any individual phase of our economic life, we must avoid doing anything that obscures the hope of reasonable reward for work or enterprise—which means that we must avoid introducing elements of uncertainty by attempting to impose discretionary control of economic factors by a small group of human beings over the free play of human activity and natural forces.

3. In dealing with any given problem or group of problems we must seek the basic cause of present maladjustments and not be satisfied with plausible false premises such as, for example, that the capitalistic system has failed.

In agriculture we must face the fact that for years we have placed agriculture at a disadvantage with industry by our protective tariff on manufactured goods.

In industry we must face the fact that, owing to industrial concentration and technological improvement, we have made production less sensitive to the workings of supply and demand as expressed in the price mechanism, and that we have rendered industrial employment somewhat less stable.

In banking we must face the fact that we have never had a proper banking reform nor insisted upon bankers being properly qualified.

And in foreign trade we must face the fact that we have had no policy other than a hit or miss policy of opportunism.

4. We must therefore make our endeavors in the following directions:

(a) In agriculture we must remedy the basic difficulty by attempting to regain some of our lost foreign markets, and by adjusting our production to demand, not by Government manipulation, but by enlightening our agricultural producers as to the actualities of supply and demand.

(b) In industry we must do much the same thing; that is, adjust production to demand, again, not by Government regulation, but by a better understanding of markets and by attempting to react more quickly to changes in demand as they occur.

Furthermore, we must seek to mitigate the effects of periods of expansion and contraction by providing for unemployment compensation out of the profits of periods of prosperity.

(c) In banking we must reform our whole system so that we may have a currency and a banking system which shall not be subject to the vagaries of political expediency nor to abuse by self-seeking special interests.

(d) In foreign trade we must develop a policy of co-operation with other nations, with the twofold objective of preserving peace and achieving a better balance between agriculture and industry at home.

We must learn to adapt our foreign lendings and borrowings to the realities of our foreign trade.

5. Finally, all this means that we must seek to cure our problem primarily by finding out what it really is. In this our Government can help us by providing us with all the facts that pertain to it. The actual cure must be effected not by a small body of men sitting in Washington, but by all of us performing our various functions on the basis of a more enlightened self-interest.

CHAPTER X

It's Up To You and Me

If you have been at all convinced by the foregoing that we are headed at present in two more or less contradictory directions—that is, towards inflation on the one hand, and towards a regimented planned society on the other—

If you have been to some extent convinced that what we want is neither inflation nor government by bureaucratic dictation—

If you have been persuaded that, within the framework of the traditional American order, we can do much to avoid a recurrence of past misfortune, and if your mind has been stimulated a little in that direction—

Then it would be only natural for you to ask yourself the question:

“As a citizen what can I do to bring about a change in the present trend?”

If I have stimulated you to ask yourself that question, then I shall have accomplished the major purpose of this book.

It is not the only purpose, for I need not tell you, if you have been patient enough to read through to this point, that I have also tried my best to persuade you of certain basic principles which seem to me essential if we are to preserve our freedom and the future happiness of those who come after us.

There is only one thing more that I can try to do, and that is to put into concrete form the things that you might ask yourself, first, in order to determine where you stand, and, second, to see how you can make your stand mean something.

Here are some of the questions you might ask yourself in order to crystallize in your own mind where you stand:

As to Form of Government

1. Would you like this country to retain its traditional form of Constitutional representative government?
2. If not, do you favor Fascism, Communism, Socialism, or any other ism? If so, which? and why?

As to Form of Economy

1. Do you believe in "Planned Economy"—that is, an economic structure in which an all-powerful central government attempts to regulate production, consumption, and distribution, instead of giving free play to the law of supply and demand?
2. Do you believe there can be such a thing as an all-wise and all-powerful government?
3. If you do not believe in a planned and government-directed economy, do you believe that a "free economy," such as we have had, can and should be regulated to prevent abuse?

4. If you believe in such regulation, do you think it should be accomplished

(a) by the enactment of intelligent laws and their enforcement by the courts? Or

(b) by the concentration of discretionary power in the officials and bureaus of a central government?

5. If it is necessary at times to vest certain administrative powers in Federal boards or commissions, do you believe that such boards or commissions should be appointed by the Executive alone, or that such appointments should be made from the Civil Service lists unless especially confirmed by the Senate?

As to Government Relations with Agriculture and Industry

1. Do you believe Government should go into business in competition with:

(a) Transportation companies?

(b) Power companies?

(c) Other industry?

2. Do you believe Government should fix selling prices for:

(a) Farm products?

(b) Factory products?

3. Do you believe Government should restrict farmers as to:

(a) What crops they shall plant?

(b) What acreage for each crop?

4. Do you believe in attempting to regain a part of our lost export markets for agricultural products by an intelligent downward revision of our tariff structure?

5. Do you believe Government should restrict manufacturers as to the amount of goods they shall produce?

6. Do you believe that the hope of profits is essential to business enterprise?

7. Do you believe Government should attempt to control or regulate profits in industries other than public utilities?

As to Labor

1. Do you favor making membership in a labor union a necessary condition of obtaining employment?

2. Do you favor fixing by Government of:

(a) Minimum wages?

(b) Wages, except minimum wages?

(c) Maximum working hours?

(d) Hours of work other than maximum hours?

3. Do you favor a compulsory system of compensation for unemployment?

4. If your answer to the preceding question is "Yes," then do you favor contributions to such compensation by:

- (a) the employer?
- (b) the employees?
- (c) the Government?

5. Do you favor old-age pensions at government expense?

6. If so, should this be taken care of by the Federal Government, or by the states?

As to Money and Wealth

(This ground was covered in my previous book.)

1. Do you favor the use by the Government of its taxing power or other powers for the purpose of taking away wealth or income from one group and giving it to another?

2. If not, do you favor Government's putting "a ceiling" on wealth or income by graduated income and inheritance taxes? And, if so, do you believe that the endeavor to accomplish this would be helped by the elimination of tax-exempt securities and a general revision of our tax laws?

3. Do you approve of reducing the value of savings, life-insurance policies, and wages, in order to make it easier for debtors to repay?

4. Do you think anyone really benefits from currency debasement?

5. Do you favor having the Government increase or decrease the purchasing power of the dollar from time to time by the action of its administrative officers?

6. Do you believe in a "managed currency," or do you think that a modernized gold standard should be re-established?

7. Do you favor political control over the issuance of currency, or do you favor having this power vested in a non-political body, such as the Federal Reserve Board was intended to be?

8. Do you think that there should be any further doses of inflation? If so, by the issuance of greenbacks? By the adoption of bimetallism? By further reduction of the gold content of the dollar?

As to Banking

1. Do you believe that the banking system should be taken over and operated by the Government?

2. If not, do you think that our private banking system has long been due for a thorough overhauling and that a commission should be appointed to study this whole question?

As to Government Organization and Expenditure

1. Do you favor reducing the number of employees on the Government pay-roll? (There are now over 650,000 holding Federal jobs—exclusive of P.W.A.,

C.W.A., or such agencies.)

2. Do you favor a further increase in the national debt?

3. If yes, have you any limit in mind?

4. If you do not favor a further increase in the national debt, do you think the budget should be balanced by:

(a) increasing taxation?

(b) decreasing expenditure? Or

(c) a combination of both?

5. Do you believe in the theory of spending your way out of the depression? If so, would you set limit on:

(a) the total amount to be spent?

(b) the purposes for which it is to be spent?

6. If you do not believe in the spending theory, do you think Government expenditure should from here on be limited to the relief of suffering, and should not extend into permanent or semi-permanent investments in agriculture, industry, and banking?

7. Do you think the national credit has already been endangered?

8. Do you think that an unfair burden of taxation will have to be imposed on future generations in order to retire the debt now being created?

As to Foreign Trade

1. Do you think foreign trade is of no particular importance to this country?

2. If so, do you think we should pursue a course of national self-sufficiency?

3. If you think foreign trade is important, do you think that it is high time that the question posed by Secretary Wallace should be answered? And that we should do something about regaining our foreign markets?

4. Do you think we should once and for all decide not to make any more foreign loans?

5. Or do you think that foreign loans should in future be made when they are compatible with a definitely established foreign trade policy?

6. Do you believe that the prevention of war is the primary economic necessity of the future?

7. If so, do you believe that the removal of economic irritations is the best way to prevent war?

8. If it is not the best way, what is?

9. If it is the best way, do you favor international co-operation in:

(a) removing excessive trade barriers?

(b) re-establishing international currency stability?

There you have a list of questions to ask yourself in order to clarify in your own mind where you stand. Doubtless you will find that, whereas you have a very clear conviction in regard to some questions, you are a little doubtful in your mind as to others. Doubtless you will think of other questions on which you feel strongly, but which I have not even mentioned.

As to any question on which you are unclear, it may be helpful to apply this formula:

1. What is the effect of this question upon the rebirth of private initiative, without which we are doomed to a course not very different from that which we have seen abroad? And
2. What is the real interest of the nation as a whole?

And now let us assume that you have become clear in your mind just where you stand. What can you do about it?

Or, first—should you do anything about it?

The answer is to my mind unequivocal:

If you want to remain a free citizen in a free country, you have got to do something about it. A government can govern us if we refuse to govern ourselves.

But a government cannot save our freedom for us.

That is something we must do ourselves.

What then, can you do? What can I do? What can any of us do?

We can do quite a lot of things. But, before I go into that, let me make one thing just as clear as I can:

This book is not a political campaign document.

I am not interested—perhaps I should be—in either the Republican party or the Democratic party. Both are to me fairly meaningless labels.

There are many Democrats with whom I find myself in thorough sympathy. Likewise there are many Republicans. And there are leaders in both parties with whom I feel that I have very little in common.

The whole problem seems to me to cut straight across all established party lines. It is not a question of whether we elect more Democrats or more Republicans. It is a question of whether we elect more men of sound sense and a feeling of responsibility, or more men of wild ideas and no sense of responsibility.

I have already said that much of what I have attacked did not originate with the New Deal. I say that again.

I have already said that the fault lies not so much with those in Washington as with those at home. That also I say again.

What, then, should those at home do?

1. They should find out something about the men for whom they are going to be asked to vote. They should insist on knowing where these men stand on any issue that seems important. They should refuse to be put off with vague answers.

2. They should vote for the men who come the closest to representing the views they want represented—on matters political, social, and economic. They should vote for these men irrespective of party affiliation.

3. In future they should start sooner and try to see that the political party to which they belong puts up candidates who conform to their requirements, so that they can vote for their party as well as for their convictions. But that is the work of party reorganization, which must be done in the future. Today the question of party matters very little.

Today it is a question whether in a few years we shall have any parties at all—or just a totalitarian state.

4. Finally, those at home should not only exercise their own right to vote in this way, but they should see that others do likewise.

Once you have convinced yourself, it is not hard to convince others.

A good cause is worth fighting for.

The American people will never have a better cause than their own freedom.

Get out and fight.

That is what you can do.

And remember it is ideas you are fighting—not men. Half-baked, half-understood ideas, launched without sufficient test or criticism under the stress of emergency—these, and the apathetic indifference of a people to its own problems, are the real enemies of freedom.

The men who launch their plans and schemes are for the most part well-meaning; they at least are thinking about existing problems and doing their human best to solve them.

That is more than most of us are doing.

And, in any case, individual men are not of great consequence—just as you and I as individuals are of no particular significance.

It is only as a whole that we matter—only as a whole that our destiny is important. And our destiny as a whole will be determined, not by any one man or group of men, but by all of us.

Appendix

A. AGAINST INFLATION

B. WHAT INJUSTICE?

C. BANKING AS A PROFESSION

A.

Against Inflation

The following is an excerpt from an address made by the author on April 30, 1934, before the Wharton School of Commerce, University of Pennsylvania, in which are outlined more or less categorically the arguments against the inflationary and experimental monetary policies that have been pursued by the present administration. The whole subject is more fully treated in The Money Muddle.

Those who have advocated monetary manipulation have done so in the belief that the depression was caused by the breakdown of our monetary system. With this premise to start from, which I think is a wrong premise, they then embrace what to my mind are a number of secondary fallacies.

As to the basic premise, I believe that the economic condition from which we have been suffering is the result of a great number of factors working in combination. Primarily it is the result of the War and of our post-War failure to realize the changes that had taken place.

The War resulted in a shifting of millions of people from peace-time into war-time activities, the intense stimulation of agriculture and certain industries in some parts of the world, and the destruction of agriculture and industry in others. When the War ended and the armies came home, there was not only the problem of re-employing the returning soldiers or the war-workers whom the soldiers displaced, but there was the problem of readjusting agriculture, trade, and industry to peace-time conditions.

New nations and new frontiers had changed the old channels of trade.

The idea of national self-sufficiency had been born out of the bitter experience of war.

Governments were staggering under enormous debts incurred mostly for purely destructive purposes, and at the same time governments were faced with a greater necessity for relief expenditure than ever before.

Unbalanced budgets threatened the safety of currencies and made all the nations anxious to export as much and import as little as possible.

Added to all this, the Treaty of Versailles imposed reparations upon Germany which were economically impossible.

None of these facts were fully realized, and when they were realized, they were shoved aside because the social implications of the indicated economic readjustment were too serious to face.

Consequently, there arose a network of artificial barriers to trade in the form of tariffs, import quotas, exchange restrictions, etc. In addition, excessive foreign lending operations, mostly by England and the United States, served for a time to offset the drain of gold upon the debtor nations, but in the end only made matters worse.

What is more, our entire nation proceeded to indulge in an orgy of speculation, with the result that a debt structure was built up upon foreign and domestic values which were largely fictitious.

When the inevitable collapse came, bank assets froze and the gold-standard mechanism broke down, and that accentuated the deflationary spiral and led to the acute stage of the depression. In this connection it is essential to remember that the gold-standard mechanism is a mechanism for settling temporary disequilibria in the balance of payment between nations. What happened through the course of events which I have just briefly indicated was that the gold-standard mechanism was used not to settle temporary disequilibria, but in an attempt to compensate permanent maladjustments. It is obvious that such an attempt would have to lead first to a maldistribution of gold, and then to a complete breakdown of the gold-standard mechanism.

To say that the entire depression was caused by the breakdown of the monetary system is to my mind like saying that measles are caused by a rash. Given the destruction and maladjustment of a great war, given the failure of human intelligence to grapple with the post-war problem, and the various other factors briefly enumerated, it is hard to see how any monetary system could have survived the strain.

So much for the premise. As to the secondary fallacies, I have dealt with these at length in The Money Muddle. Let me confine myself here to these assertions:

1. It is not necessarily a good thing to raise prices. On the contrary, unless incomes rise along with prices, it is easy to see that the standard of living must go down. It is therefore desirable to raise prices only to the extent that incomes keep pace with them.

2. It is not desirable to raise all prices, but rather to bring about an adjustment between prices and costs of production which will enable agriculture and industry to produce at a profit but not necessarily at higher prices. Some prices, notably those of agricultural products, fell during the depression below the actual cost of production, but this was by no means true of all manufactured goods.

3. Depreciating a currency cannot remove discrepancies in a price level, because if it raises prices, it raises all prices.

4. To lighten the burden of debt by depreciating the currency is to benefit a very small minority of the population at the expense of a large majority. This is true because the mass debts of the nation are one and the same thing as the mass savings of the nation, and because by far the greater part of the population is preponderantly interested as a creditor rather than as a debtor.

5. In an economy such as ours, recovery can only be brought about by an increased volume of business done in the expectation of reasonable profit. Therefore, anything that obscures the hope of profit tends to retard recovery.

6. Uncertainty as to the future character and value of money is perhaps the strongest single deterrent to business enterprise.

7. Our present monetary policy creates uncertainty as to the future character of money in that, under the Gold Reserve Act, the President has the power either to return to a gold standard or to adopt some form of managed commodity index dollar. Furthermore, so long as the Thomas Amendment remains on the books, there is the additional uncertainty as to whether greenbacks will be resorted to. The same thing is true of the permissive powers vested in the President with regard to silver.

8. Uncertainty as to the future value of the dollar is created by the same factors just enumerated as affecting its future character. In addition, the program of government expenditure and the uncertain prospect of a return to a balanced budget create further uncertainty as to the ultimate extent to which depreciation will go.

9. The school of thought which believes in a monetary cure has laid great stress upon the metal base of the currency and the nature of the circulating medium, but the currency itself represents only a small part of our money structure. By far the greatest part consists of bank money; that is, deposit money. Therefore, if a cure for our troubles is to be found in monetary reform, such reform must concern itself not only with the currency but with the banking structure.

For these and other reasons it would appear to me that a continuation of our present monetary policy not only will fail to bring about recovery, but, as a matter of fact, will retard recovery. Therefore, I should rule out the first alternative—namely, more inflation, which is being advocated by one wing of the administration forces at the present time.

B.

What Injustice?

If the statement on page 56 in Chapter IV seems a strong statement, the following excerpt from an address made by the author before the National Association of Mutual Savings Banks, on May 17, 1934, is offered in substantiation:

We are living in a time when strange things are being done to the economic order, and many strange ideas are being tried. Much of this is a necessary consequence of the admitted failure of our past leaders. Much of it is a natural revulsion against the excesses committed under the old order. But much, too, is an unnecessary and unwise emotional jettisoning of anything and everything that had to do with the traditions and beliefs of the past.

Normally, at a time like this, when the protracted distress of the people provides ideal pasture for radical reformers, when the copy-book maxims are more or less in disrepute, it devolves upon the conservative bankers and economists to preserve the balance. It is their function, at such a time, to puncture the bubbles of fantastic dreamers, to lay bare the fallacies of the false prophets, and to demolish the threadbare blandishments of the demagogue.

Today all too many of our economists are political economists, with the accent on the political. Today our commercial bankers are so intimidated by the criticism and abuse that has been heaped upon them—so conscious that some of it, though by no means all, is merited—that scarcely a voice is heard.

Upon you, the savings bankers, who are immune from popular disfavor, there rests all the more heavily, it seems to me, the duty to make your voices heard, wherever and whenever you see injustice being done to the interests of the millions whom you disinterestedly represent.

Whether or not injustice is being done to the owners of the forty million savings accounts in the savings banks and banks of this country is, of course, a matter of opinion. Very likely no two of us would completely agree. I shall state my own views briefly, in the hope that by so doing I may perhaps stimulate you to express yours, irrespective of whether they agree with mine or not.

Let me say quite simply and clearly at the outset that I do believe an injustice—a great injustice—is being done to every man and woman who has money deposited in your care. That is a strong statement and requires a bill of particulars. I cannot here attempt to go into all the aspects of our Government's present policies.

But, in so far as the savings depositor is directly concerned—not as a citizen in general, but as a savings depositor—I am prepared to state specifically why I believe that he is suffering both harm and injustice.

I shall confine myself to two major reasons for this statement:

1. Because the savings depositor is actually being deprived of a part of his savings, and
2. Because the savings depositor is in the process of being denied the opportunity of receiving a fair return on his savings.

That is my personal opinion, with which some may not agree. Let me see if I can substantiate it to your satisfaction.

I say that the savings depositor is actually being deprived of a part of his savings because we have embarked upon a monetary policy which, though in many ways obscure, is quite clear in one respect at least, in that:

It is a policy of deliberately depreciating the dollar in order to raise prices and lighten the so-called "burden of debt."

I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction that a savings depositor is damaged directly and immediately to the extent that such a policy is successful. Reducing the value of one hundred dollars to sixty dollars is the same thing as taking away forty dollars out of every one hundred dollars.

I do not mean that the amount of the damage done at present is forty per cent just because the gold content of the dollar has been reduced by that amount, or because the dollar is selling for about sixty cents of its old par in terms of foreign exchange. The dollar is probably still about an eighty-five to ninety cent dollar in internal purchasing power. Therefore, the savings depositor—unless he intended to spend his money abroad—has so far only lost at most a sixth of his savings.

But it seems to me that for the great majority, if not for all of your depositors, a loss of fifteen dollars in every one hundred dollars is a very serious loss indeed.

Nor is that the worst of it. Frank avowal by the Government of its intention to seek a considerably higher price level—which is the same thing as seeking a considerably lower dollar—is a very definite threat of greater loss still to be inflicted upon the savings depositor.

The Government itself has not to my knowledge defined the exact extent to which it seeks to debase the purchasing power of the dollar—or, to use the polite phrase, to what extent it seeks to “reflate” the price level. Some of the proponents of this policy have been more specific than the Government. They have advocated the restoration of a 1926 “honest dollar.” Why the 1926 dollar should be any more honest than the 1913 dollar, or the dollar of any other particular year, is something which, to me at least, remains shrouded in mystery. I only know that the 1926 price level means that a housewife would have to pay 18 cents for a yard of gingham as against 10 cents today; that a man would have to pay $5.00 for a pair of shoes as against $3.50 today; that a pound of butter would cost a little over 53 cents as against a little over 27 cents today; and that potatoes would cost more than twice as much as they do now.

No one has ever explained to me what is to give people the increased incomes, which they would need in order to pay those prices—which they would need if the “honest dollar” of 1926 were restored.

But, the proponents of the theory will tell you, the “burden of debt” has become insupportable and is unjust because it was contracted in a cheap dollar and must be paid in a “dishonest 1934 dollar.” That is an argument which seems to me to overlook three basic elements of the debtor-creditor relationship.

In the first place, it overlooks the fact that for every debtor there is a creditor, which means that the “burden of debt,” if turned over on its other side, is the savings of the people.

In the second place, it overlooks the corollary to that axiom: namely, that whatever is done to the general advantage of all debtors is thereby done to the general disadvantage of all creditors.

And third, it overlooks the fact that in this nation of ours a preponderant majority of the people are more creditor than debtor, and that only a small minority have a debtor interest greater than their creditor position.

The forty million savings accounts in the country are damaged to the extent that the dollars deposited with you are debased and will purchase less than they would have purchased at the time they were deposited.

We do not know to what extent the Government intends to proceed with this policy. Certainly it intends to bring the internal purchasing power of the dollar down to at least sixty per cent. Otherwise the whole theory of devaluation would be meaningless. It therefore seems fair to state that your depositors must look forward to a certain shrinkage of forty per cent in the value of their savings accounts if the Government is successful in making the devaluation theory work.

Nor is that all. In a recently published book, Professor Kemmerer has shown that in all likelihood the eventual result of our raising the price of gold to thirty-five dollars an ounce or more will actually raise prices—that is, depreciate the purchasing power of the dollar—by much more than the indicated forty per cent.

I am not going to tilt here at the straw man of uncontrolled inflation. A mismanagement of our present policy may lead to uncontrolled inflation, but a mismanagement of any policy leads to disaster. I am only concerned here with pointing out that the probable effects of our present policy, even if it does not break away from control, will be to depreciate the purchasing power of the dollar to a point where the billions of savings entrusted to your care will have shrunk more than fifty per cent in value.

That is why I feel no hesitation in saying that our present monetary policy deprives your depositors of a part of their savings. To some extent this is an accomplished fact. To a far greater extent it depends upon the degree to which our present policy is pursued further, and upon the extent to which we continue to retreat before the inflationists.

Now as to the second point. I believe that the savings depositor is in the process of being deprived of the opportunity to receive a fair return on his savings in the future. I say this because of a general philosophy which is being pursued by our Government, and because of certain specific legislation.

The general philosophy to which I refer is the philosophy that government is the mainspring of national life—a view which is being carried to its logical conclusion in several European countries at the present time, and which leads to the complete suppression of the individual in favor of the all-powerful State. More than once in the past few years we have heard from those fortunately distant shores the echoes of the slogan that man exists for the State and not the State for man. But here, so far as I know, we as a people have not reached any decision to abandon our accustomed type of life; up to date we have looked upon the officers of government not as masters but as servants of the people, and we have looked upon ourselves, the people, as masters of our own destiny. While, as I say, we have not reached any decision to abandon this philosophy, it seems to me that we are acting in many respects as if we had.

It seems to me that we are in danger of passing on to a central authority, always ready to grow by what it feeds on, problems which we have been in the habit of solving individually by the application of what has been called American ingenuity.

That is what I mean by saying that there is a general philosophy in Washington today which seems to me to obscure the hope of reward, and which, therefore, tends to deprive the man who accumulates savings of the opportunity to invest these savings profitably.

Specifically, the Securities Act of 1933 and the proposed National Securities Exchange Act of 1934 have expressed this philosophy in a way which directly affects the savings depositor. In its anxiety to prevent a recurrence of the unfortunate experience of investors in the past, the Government has practically destroyed the investment machinery, and thereby destroyed the channels through which the savings of the people have in the past found their natural employment in supplying the capital needs of business.

Probably all of us would agree that some sort of legislation to prevent a recurrence of past abuse was necessary. Probably all of us would agree that there is much in the Securities Act and in the proposed National Securities Exchange Act that is good and necessary. There is no doubt that our system needed reform to prevent a speculative mania from again seizing the country as it did in the years preceding the 1929 crash. There is no doubt that it was necessary to impress upon investment bankers the fact that they had a twofold responsibility: first, a responsibility towards the investing public; and second, a responsibility to render sound advice to the business interests which come to seek capital in the investment market. Some of our investment bankers have always been aware of this responsibility; others have been guided too much by their desire to make profits for themselves.

The trouble with the recent legislation is that it seeks to meet the need for reform by purely mechanical means. One cannot, as I have previously said, legislate intelligence nor integrity. It is not necessary here to go into a detailed criticism of the two Acts. You are all familiar with them, and you are familiar with the objections that have been raised against them.

If the Government is to be the one great spender, the one great employer of men, the one great borrower of funds—if private enterprise is to be unable to find capital to replace outworn plant and machinery except by going to the Government—if bankers are no longer to perform their traditional function of bringing together the accumulators of savings with productive enterprise, which legitimately requires capital, and if that function is henceforth to be exercised by the Government—

Then it is difficult to see how you gentlemen are going to be able to find investments which will provide safety for your depositors and at the same time enable you to pay them a reasonable rate of return.

C.

Banking As A Profession

The following is the full text of an address made by the author before the Choosing-A-Career Conference in Newark, New Jersey, on June 26, 1934, of college seniors from various universities:

You are here for the purpose of considering a choice of vocation.

I have been asked to talk to you about banking and finance, and it might reasonably be expected that I would present to you a number of reasons why a banking career is an attractive one to consider. I doubt very much whether what I shall have to say will cause any of you to become bankers. It may on the contrary cause some of you who are already headed towards banking to choose a different career, and it is barely possible that it may tend to make a few of you decide to go into banking with a different point of view than you might otherwise have had. That would be the most I could hope for.

The main theme of what I have to say to you is very simple:

Banking as a business career is dead. Banking as a profession is in its infancy—I might almost say, is not yet born.

There have been excluded from this conference the recognized professions, such as law, medicine, and architecture. Banking has been included as one of a number of possible business or vocational pursuits. In my judgment it has no place in a conference which deals with the various possible methods of making money.

In the past the majority of college graduates who have entered the banking business have done so for one of two reasons: because they thought all bankers got reasonably rich with reasonable ease and rapidity; or because the banking business had a certain traditional social prestige. Stated another way, the banking business was considered pre-eminently respectable, and one's friends—one's respectable friends, I mean—were likely to be in it too.

That is why most college-bred bankers in this country originally became bank runners or bond salesmen immediately after their graduation. Many of them are—or were until recently—the respected heads of commercial banks and investment banking houses.

Many of them will consider me a heretic when I say to you that these considerations are out of date and no longer valid. But I do say just that.

If you are thinking of becoming a banker because you think banking would be a nice respectable way to make quite a little money—stay out of it.

If you are thinking of becoming a banker because in that way you will meet the best people and attain social prestige—stay out of it.

If you think that all you need to become a banker is a college degree and that cardinal virtue of the get-rich-quick era, “a nice personality”—stay out of it.

Having the right friends and a good set of teeth used to be the entrance requirements. They are that no longer.

What you need today is a very different set of tools. You need primarily three things: certain elements of character; a very definite philosophy; and a background of proper training.

With regard to character, you need more than average intelligence, more than average patience, and more than average integrity. If you are not reasonably sure that your intelligence is above the average—if you are aware of the fact that you are naturally impatient—it is better to choose some other career. As to integrity, I do not suppose that anyone can judge his own honesty, but certainly no one with any doubt as to his own ability to withstand temptation should choose a banking career.

Finally, and most important of all, you must like your fellow man and be interested in him. You must be willing to listen to his problems and troubles, not because your job demands it, but because you enjoy it—because you derive both interest and satisfaction from doing it.

Some of the best bankers I know are rendered relatively ineffective because they sit locked away in carefully guarded offices and are inaccessible to the average man.

It goes without saying that a bank executive cannot spend his entire day seeing anyone who wants to see him. It goes without saying that he must delegate much of his contact with the public to his fellow officers. But, if the chief executive has no contact at first hand with the Tom, Dick, and Harrys of his clientele, he very soon loses touch with the realities, and so loses much of his practical value to the community.

While it is difficult to be specific in regard to character, it is not difficult to state the requirements as to general philosophy. What you need is the philosophy of the professional career. You need to be driven into banking by the same kind of impulse that drives one man into becoming a surgeon or scientist, that compels another to become a newspaper man because he has the itch to write, or insists upon an artistic career because of an inner need for that kind of expression.

You need to go into banking not because it may lead you to the acquisition of wealth, power, or prestige, but because you want to serve others in that particular field. If you serve them well, you can hope for prestige and power—not the kind that comes from wealth, but the kind of power and prestige that inevitably accrues to good leadership and wise counsel.

If you feel that your desire is for material reward, if your nature is essentially a competitive one, it will probably be difficult for you to acquire this sort of philosophy. The rewards of a good professional career are only in a secondary sense material. The primary satisfaction is that of a job well done, of having helped some people out of trouble and kept others from getting into it, and so of acquiring a reputation for being able to give the best advice.

The field of banking and finance is a very wide one. It has been suggested that I should attempt to cover here a few of its major aspects. I do not see very much point in attempting to do that, because what I have to say to you applies to all the various executive phases of banking, and because I assume that everyone here today would consider banking only from the point of view of seeking ultimately to attain an executive position. Nevertheless, it may be useful to define the functions of the four major classifications of bankers if only to show that the requirements for each of the four categories are basically the same.

The four major categories are, as you know, the commercial banker, the investment banker, the savings banker, and the trust officer.

The job of the commercial banker is to provide a safe refuge for the surplus short-term funds of his community—and to satisfy the legitimate short-term borrowing requirements of his community. In other words, he must provide safety for the depositors of money which is temporarily idle, and lend such money to others who have a legitimate temporary need for it. To do that he must be honest, careful, intelligent, well-trained, and unbiased by personal interest.

The job of the investment banker is much the same, except that he deals in long-term funds instead of short-term. It is his function to provide safe and profitable employment for capital accumulated out of savings, and to provide for business enterprise the long-term money which it needs to finance its capital requirements. The qualifications for the investment banker are much the same. He must be honest, careful, intelligent, well-trained—though differently trained from the commercial banker—and he, too, must be unbiased by personal interest.

The job of the trust officer is to manage the financial affairs of people who are unable or unwilling to manage them for themselves. He looks after the safety of principal and the obtaining of income for beneficiaries of estates and trusts, just as the head of a family looks after the financial welfare of his wife and children. He is a professional investor for others, and as such he must have the same qualifications—again with a slightly different background of specialized training—as the commercial banker and the investment banker.

The function of the savings banker is very much like that of the trust officer, except that where the trust officer deals with a number of individual problems, each slightly different from the others, the savings banker deals in the aggregate with the savings of large masses of people. These savings he must invest carefully and intelligently so as to protect safety of principal and enable him to pay a reasonable rate of interest. Furthermore, he must also be prepared at all times to meet a certain number of withdrawals. It is clear that his general qualifications must be very similar to those of the other three categories.

Were I to discuss in detail the various functions and opportunities contained within these four major categories, it would be necessary to point out certain essential differences in the requirements of character and training, but that would lead too far afield in a discussion of this sort. Before leaving the subject of general philosophy and discussing briefly the type of training which seems to me desirable, I should like to stress the absolute necessity in any kind of banker for lack of bias by reason of personal interest.

The original concept of a banker was that of a money-lender. Originally the money-lender probably loaned out only his own funds. Then because he was rich, others entrusted their funds to him for safekeeping and he proceeded to lend those out as well. His primary motive for being in the banking business was the motive of making profit. Upon that conception our whole modern banking structure has been built up, but it is my belief that civilization has advanced to a point now where that conception is no longer justifiable. A banker may no longer regard himself as being in business for his own profit. He is the custodian of the funds of the people, and it is his function to supply credit so that the machinery of production, distribution, and consumption can function properly.

That does not mean that a bank as such should not be entitled to make profits. Broadly speaking, a bank should make profits which are analagous to insurance premiums—that is, it should receive fair compensation for the risks it undertakes in order that it may meet the losses which it will inevitably encounter. Further than that it should be entitled to show a fair margin of profit, because otherwise no one would be willing to supply the capital without which banks cannot operate.

This institutional profit, however, is a very different thing from individual profit. A bank officer should be paid liberally, but he should not have any personal financial interests which may tend to prejudice his judgment.

I am convinced that unless we come to this general philosophy among bankers—not by law, but by a process of education and public opinion—banking will pass altogether out of the hands of private individuals and into the hands of government. That, I think, would be a catastrophe, because I believe that the evils of political control and operation of the banking machinery, particularly in a democratic country, would be far greater than the worst evils of an abused private banking system.

This is scarcely the place in which to advocate or oppose reforms and changes in our banking structure, and yet I cannot convey clearly to you what I mean by the “necessary philosophy” without saying what I have just said. In the end it comes down to this:

Unless you are prepared to live on a salary—or on such other inherited income as you may have, plus a salary—I do not think you should go into banking. I would even go so far as to say to any of you that may inherit capital in some form or another:

“If you are going to be a banker, engage someone else in whom you have confidence to look after your own investments or those of your family. Don’t try to do it yourself and at the same time advise others, or handle the funds of others.”

And now a word as to the background of training: The mere fact of having a college degree may mean much or little. It may mean that you have barely squeaked by your examinations, or that you were Phi Beta Kappa. It may mean that you have majored in government and economics, or it may be that you have spent most of your time, as I did, reading the Greek and Latin poets.

If you have not completed your college course with reasonably good marks, the chances are that you are either not intelligent enough or not industrious enough to make a good banker. Both are curable to a certain extent, but they will not cure themselves.

If you have specialized in economics and government, you have probably laid the foundations for the further studies that you will want to pursue. If you have not done so, I hope you will not make the mistake of trying to become a banker without any knowledge of these subjects.

One of the chief defects of our present banking system is that so few of our present-day bankers were properly educated. You would probably be surprised at the number of bank presidents who have become heads of their institutions for no other reason than that they were good bond salesmen and go-getters. Then there is the other kind of bank president who has come up through the ranks without much education of any sort. As a rule, however, these latter men have taken the trouble to acquire a certain amount of background as they have gone on, and, in any case, they have practical experience and hard work behind them.

No matter what phase of banking you decide to enter, I cannot urge you too strongly to acquire a basic knowledge of economics and government. Without that you will never understand your function in the community or be able to give the right kind of advice.

Another thing that you need is at least an elementary training in the history of banking and the present banking law. You would again be surprised how few present-day bankers have that.

Then I would urge you, before you specialize in any particular type of banking, to acquire a certain amount of practical experience in all of them.

After that the best advice I can give you is to pick your job, not so much according to where the highest salary can be obtained, but according to where you can work under the ablest man. Most of the best knowledge of banking cannot be found in textbooks and is only to be found in the accumulated experience of a few individuals. Therefore, the best education for a young banker is to absorb experience as much as he can from the man directly over him.

There is one more point I should like to stress in regard to training. We are living in a time when what were formerly watertight compartments between nations have been so penetrated by the elimination of time and distance that no one can think intelligently about economic matters if he confines his thinking to the things that are happening in any one country. If you are going in for foreign banking, it goes without saying that this implies a special study of foreign countries and foreign banking technique. But even if you are going to be a country banker in the Middle West, you cannot be an intelligent banker if you are totally unaware of the changes that are constantly taking place in the different parts of the world.

To sum up what I have said, there is no need for you to deliberate whether or not to enter the banking business. There is no banking business.

Whether or not it is wise for you to enter the banking profession depends first upon your natural equipment; second, upon your ability to acquire the true professional philosophy; and third, upon your willingness and ability to acquire the proper training.

If you comply with all these requirements, it still remains for you to maintain throughout your career the philosophy of disinterested service, and it remains for you also to keep abreast of your problem by constant study and by never making the mistake of thinking that your training is complete.

I am convinced that if our future bankers are men who enter the profession upon these premises, it will not be long before we have a model banking system in this country. If they do not, and if our future bankers are men who consider banking a business rather than a profession, I am convinced that no amount of laws and regulations will give us a good banking system.

A NOTE ON THE TYPE IN WHICH THIS BOOK IS SET

DEVICE OF
ROBERT GRANJON

This book is set in Granjon, a type named in compliment to ROBERT GRANJON, but neither a copy of a classic face nor an entirely original creation. George W. Jones drew the basic design for this type from classic sources, but deviated from his model to profit by the intervening centuries of experience and progress. This type is based primarily upon the type used by Claude Garamond (1510-61) in his beautiful French books, and more closely resembles Garamond's own than do any of the various modern types that bear his name.

Of Robert Granjon nothing is known before 1545, except that he had begun his career as type-cutter in 1523. The boldest and most original designer of his time, he was one of the first to practise the trade of type-founder apart from that of printer. Between 1549 and 1551 he printed a number of books in Paris, also continuing as type-cutter. By 1557 he was settled in Lyons and had married Antoinette Salamon, whose father, Bernard, was an artist associated with Jean de Tournes. Between 1557 and 1562 Granjon printed about twenty books in types designed by himself, following, after the fashion of the day, the cursive handwriting of the time. These types, usually known as "caractères de civilité," he himself called "lettres françaises," as especially appropriate to his own country. He was granted a monopoly of these types for ten years, but they were soon copied. Granjon appears to have lived in Antwerp for a time, but was at Lyons in 1575 and 1577, and for the next decade at Rome, working for the Vatican and Medici presses, his work consisting largely in cutting exotic types. Towards the end of his life he may have returned to live in Paris, where he died in 1590.

This book was composed, printed, and bound by H. Wolff Estate, New York. The paper was manufactured by S. D. Warren Co., Boston.